

A
A 0
0
0
5
3
1
9
5
1
2

GOETHE
AND THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

J. G. ROBERTSON

THE
A. F. MORRISON
MEMORIAL LIBRARY

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

The Cambridge Manuals of Science and Literature

GOETHE
AND THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

EDITED BY
J. W. D. LLOYD
AND
J. W. D. LLOYD

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

London: FETTER LANE, E.C.

C. F. CLAY, MANAGER

Edinburgh: 100 PRINCES STREET

Berlin: A. ASHER AND CO.

Leipzig: F. A. BROCKHAUS

New York: G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

Bombay and Calcutta: MACMILLAN AND CO., LTD.

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED
PRINTED BY
JOHN B. LITTLE
NEW YORK

All rights reserved

GOETHE
AND THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

BY

J. G. ROBERTSON, M.A., PH.D.

Professor of German Language and Literature in the University of London

Cambridge :
at the University Press
New York :
G. P. Putnam's Sons
1912

With the exception of the coat of arms at the foot, the design on the title page is a reproduction of one used by the earliest known Cambridge printer, John Siberch, 1521

PT
2173
F201
C

PREFACE

GOETHE is one of those chameleon-like personalities that change in value and meaning from generation to generation. Homer, Dante, Shakespeare have been given, once and for all, their place in the world's literature, and what we think about them to-day is not materially different from what our forefathers thought; but then those poets are, in comparison, infinitely far away from us; Goethe still stands too near. We must revise our opinion of him from time to time: keep, as it were, a check on the pulse of our intellectual attitude to him. And this revision of judgment is something which we must do for ourselves. Germany, for the past five and twenty years at least, has been assiduously remoulding her literary opinions, and has progressed very far indeed from the old Hegelian self-satisfaction with which she established the hierarchy of her classical poets about the middle of the past century. But we obviously cannot rely on Germany for our opinions of Goethe, any more than Germany can turn to us to find what she has to think about English poets. Learn from her we can; we cannot afford to let anything escape us of that vast treasure of carefully garnered fact and scholarly inference which her best minds, with amazing industry, have been accumulating in recent years. But the actual judgment, the estimating of values—that we must do for ourselves, if it is to have a vital meaning for us. When a poet is great enough to interest a nation beyond his own, that nation must perforce weigh him by its own standards, must see him from the national angle.

Moreover, in the case of a poet like Goethe this necessity of independent judgment is peculiarly urgent. For Goethe has passed so completely into the flesh and blood of the modern German that the latter's attitude to him is difficult for us to comprehend unless we possess a rare familiarity with contemporary modes of German thought. The intellectual fabric of modern Germany is built on and round Goethe : it cannot dissociate itself from Goethe ; Goethe has defined its horizons. We Anglo-Saxons, on the other hand, are, in respect of Goethe, the merest outsiders ; at the best, he was for a time to us an object of intellectual curiosity ; but he has never been a real force in our intellectual life ; and knowledge of his life and thought has at no time been accounted with us more than a luxury for the literary student or the philosopher.

In the following pages I have set before myself the task of reviewing once more Goethe's life and activity in a frankly English way ; of revising the estimates of the man and his work which are, more or less, traditional amongst us ; of presenting the facts in the new light which the labours of German scholars have brought to bear on them ; and, above all, of bringing into prominence these aspects of the poet's work and teaching which have still significance for us at the beginning of the twentieth century.

Beyond the more obvious sources to which every writer on Goethe is indebted, I would especially mention here Prof. Christoph Schrenpf's Goethes Lebensanschauung in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung, Stuttgart, 1905-7, one of the most suggestive of recent books on Goethe ; and that indispensable summary of Goethe's ripest thought, Prof. Otto Harnack's Goethe in der Epoche seiner Vollendung, of which a second edition appeared in 1901.

J. G. ROBERTSON.

LONDON, April 1912.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
PREFACE	v
CHAP.
I. GOETHE'S EARLY YEARS	1
II. IN "STURM UND DRANG"	8
III. GOETHE IN WEIMAR TO 1786	27
IV. IN ITALY ; "EGMONT," "IPHIGENIE," "TASSO," "MEISTER"	38
V. THE FRIENDSHIP OF GOETHE AND SCHILLER ; GOETHE'S CLASSICISM	63
VI. THE LAST TWENTY YEARS	76
VII. "FAUST"	88
VIII. GOETHE'S PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION	103
IX. GOETHE AS A SCIENTIST AND CRITIC	128
X. GOETHE'S PERSONALITY ; CONCLUSION	141
INDEX	153

GOETHE AND THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

CHAPTER I

GOETHE'S EARLY YEARS

GOETHE'S youth possesses a certain typical significance ; it is not merely a particular poet's beginnings, but the ideal youth of a poet, a romance into which would seem to have been woven the most auspicious elements in the lives of all great poets. It is, moreover, the supremely interesting part of Goethe's life, a fact, due to no small extent to its being enshrined for us in one of the most delightful autobiographies of the world's literature.

A recent German writer has defined genius as a combination of three equally essential components : passion, imaginative alertness and judgment ; and these qualities are usually present in complementary proportions in the parents of the man of genius. In Goethe's case there can be no doubt that the rarest and most precious part of his genius came from his mother, his mental sprightliness and his agile, passionate imagination. But Goethe's mother had character as well ; her personality was strong enough to have left a mark on her age, even had she not been the mother of its greatest poet, and her delightful letters—quite the most delightful letters ever written by a poet's mother—give her a place among the brilliant women that grace so unobtrusively German literature in its classic age. Frau Rat Goethe had the priceless advantage not only of being, as she said, young with her son—she was only seventeen when he was born—but in growing up with him as well, and until her death in 1808, she remained in sympathetic touch with his thought and work.

From Goethe's father came "des Lebens ernste Führung," the energy and the staying power which enabled the young poet to preserve his balance in the many storms to which his sensitive, emotional temperament exposed him. It was just these solid, not to say stolid, qualities he inherited from his father, which prevented him from himself becoming a Werther, a Weisslingen, or a Tasso—men into whose souls he saw with preternatural clearness. But from his father came, too, the somewhat pompous, oracular manner, which grew on Goethe with the years, and occasionally exposed him, as the Weimar Geheimrat, to irreverent gibes on the part of the younger generation.

The poet has himself opened his autobiography

by assuring us that when he came into the world at Frankfort on the Main on the 28th of August, 1749, the stars were auspicious. As far as the material side of life was concerned and the opportunities for the education of mind and soul, Goethe was a child of fortune ; he was born, if not in the lap of luxury, at least amidst substantial, middle-class comforts. His father, a jurist of independent means, counted among the patricians of the Free City, and his mother was the daughter of the chief magistrate. The main disadvantage of the poet's fate was that it brought him into the German world before that world was quite ready for him. One cannot help reflecting that, had Goethe been born some ten years later, he might have stood a whole generation nearer to us to-day. His most impressionable years of youth would have been passed in a milieu more stimulating than that of Leipzig between 1765 and 1768 ; and the whole balance of his life have been tilted in favour of the nineteenth rather than the eighteenth century. He would have been able to face the problems of the French Revolution as a younger man, and with less set opinions ; he might have adapted himself more readily to the conditions of the Romantic era in which the last three decades of his life were passed. But such speculations are necessarily fruitless ; we must look rather to the many compensations his period brought him ;

4 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

and it was surely worth some measure of posthumous fame, to have been not merely young in the "Sturm und Drang," but also the leader of that most virile literary movement of the eighteenth century.

The picturesque vignettes of Goethe's early life in Frankfort, which in his Dichtung und Wahrheit, he has himself drawn for us with the delicate pen of a Chodowiecki in words, have been so often reproduced by Goethe's biographers that they may be passed over lightly here. Goethe selected the episodes which he dwells on, with instinctive tact, with a sense of relevancy to his future development; each little trait or incident, however trivial it may seem, is introduced with a purpose, is a foreshadowing of things that were to come. The marionette-theatre which Goethe's grandmother gave the children one Christmas, awakened the boy's dramatic instincts, and these were further developed by his visits to the French comedy a little later; the episode of the quartering of the art-loving Frenchman, Count Thorane, on the Goethe family, awakened in the young poet an interest in art; the sombre pictures of civil war and foreign invasion, contrasted with the brilliant pageantry of an imperial coronation in the Frankfort "Römer," kindled wider historical and political interests in his mind; and his first passion, that for the Frankfort Gretchen, which all but brought him into serious conflict with the civil powers, stirred for the first time, his emotional nature. The ultimate impression which these early chapters of Dichtung und Wahrheit leave on us is one of sunniness ; the same brilliant sun that lit up in Goethe's memory the gilded weathercock on the Sachsenhausen bridge, floods all these scenes. The shadows and the rainy days were forgotten in the brightening perspective of a fifty years' vista ; but one can imagine that Goethe's own buoyant temperament was not likely, in those early days, to have been much perturbed by the darker side of the picture.

In 1765, at the age of seventeen, Goethe was sent by his father to the University of Leipzig to be trained into a jurist like himself. And here, although still far from a real awakening of his genius, the young poet at least came into touch with the literary movement of the day, such as it was. It can hardly be said that Goethe's poetic genius was precocious ; what has been preserved of his early poetry—he destroyed, it is true, most of it himself—does not seem a very promising beginning for so great a poet. Like all the German writers of the classic age, great as well as small, Goethe responded with alacrity to every influence to which he happened to be exposed. In his Leipzig student-days he diligently imitated the Leipzig poets : he wrote comedies in alexandrines, of which it is but small praise to say that they were as good as, or even superior to, their models ; and he composed lyrics inspired by his Leipzig "Mädgen," Käthchen, or, as he called her, Annette Schönkopf, which rarely rise above the anacreontic verse of the gallant "Klein Paris." It is of such things we must think, when we say that Goethe was born before his time ; we have to regret that so great a genius had to learn the rudiments of his art in so barren a school.

6 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

The real poet of Goethe's early student-days is to be looked for, not in his verse, but in his letters. In these we find the quick sensitiveness to impression, the intense fullness of life, the passionate unrest, which gave such enormous impelling force to his life. In the vivacious correspondence with his friend Behring, rather than in the jingles to Annette, we detect the man of genius that was to be. The imitative alexandrines of the comedies, Die Laune des Verliebten and Die Mitschuldigen do little more than give us a glimpse into the distraught state of the young poet's life, and help us to realise on how false a basis he had tried to build it up. But the highs and lows of the artistic temperament are in his letters ; the bewildering alternation of jubilation and despondency, which, in 1768, when he was struck down by serious illness, was to give place to unrelieved brooding and despair. Once at home again in Frankfort, his slow convalescence made an inactive life imperative ; he had time to look regretfully back on Leipzig ; and his chief communion was with books. Rousseau became a favourite author, and the influence of a friend of the family, Susanna von Klettenberg, who belonged to the Moravian brotherhood, turned his thoughts to religion and mysticism. The mystic philosophers proved an antidote to the anacreontic trivialities of Leipzig, and from mysticism his thoughts wandered to the no less fascinating pseudo-science of alchemy. Amidst these studies and meditations, which were of obvious significance for the genesis of Faust, Goethe's outlook on life was gaining rapidly in seriousness ; the months of convalescence at home in Frankfort, were the preparation for greater things.

CHAPTER II

IN "STURM UND DRANG"

GOETHE'S real life as a poet began on that day in April 1770, when he rode through the Metzgerthor into Strassburg; for it was in Strassburg that Goethe's father had resolved his son should finish his legal training. The months the young poet lived through so intensely in this town, which, in spite of its French veneer, still remained German at heart, have a deeper significance for Goethe's personal development and the literature of his time than any other period of his career.

Here in Alsace, Goethe's buoyant, elastic temperament recovered from the moodiness of the sickbed; the clouds of Moravian pietism and mysticism were rapidly dispersed. And then, by one of those miraculous concatenations, by which, from time to time, the divine purpose in Goethe's life seemed to be made manifest, Herder arrived in Strassburg. At Herder's feet in the little Hôtel du Louvre, in a darkened room to which the elder writer was condemned during the course of an operation on the eye, Goethe imbibed the new faith of which Herder was the apostle; Rousseau became a power of the first order in his life ; his eyes were opened to the greatness of Shakespeare, of Homer, of Ossian and of folksong ; he became suddenly conscious of the beauty of Gothic architecture so magnificently exemplified in the Minster above his head. The movement of " Sturm und Drang," or " Storm and Stress," in German literature was born in these months in Strassburg ; Goethe threw himself heart and soul into it, and from 1773 onwards he was looked up to by all Germany as a pioneer and leader. " Sturm und Drang " might be described as a phase of militant individualism, the emancipation of the eighteenth-century spirit from the fetters of pseudo-classicism. Its literature bore a predominantly individualistic and personal stamp ; the thoughts and feelings of the young poets themselves, intensified and magnified, formed the immediate theme of all they wrote ; character, rather than incident or plot, was their first care ; and the personal note was of infinitely more importance in their eyes than conformity to cosmopolitan opinion. The tendency of the movement was, above all, anti-classic and national. The models of the " Sturm und Drang " literature, however, were for the most part foreign, and these not merely, like Shakespeare and the Percy Ballads, Germanic, or like Ossian, believed by these young poets to be Germanic, but even French. Goethe's Werther could never have been written had there been no Nouvelle Héloïse ; the dramatic theory of the time owed more to Diderot and Lemercier than to any German predecessor ; and it is possible that Goethe himself in some of his most imaginative flights—in the fragments of Mahomet and Cæsar—had been led thither all unawares at the hand of one who seemed to the “Stürmer und Dränger” to be the embodiment of the rationalism they opposed—Voltaire.

10 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Goethe's whole intellectual nature, his views of life and literature, underwent a revolution in this brief period. He who, not very long before, had been writing artificial comedies in the French style, became a fervid worshipper of Shakespeare ; he extolled Erwin von Steinbach, the planner of the Strassburg Minster, in a panegyric as unrestrained as if his Leipzig art-master, Adam Oeser, had never taught him that severely classic form was alone worthy of his admiration. The seething ferment of Rousseau's ideas permeated his whole nature : Rousseau's stamp is on the theses which, in a public disputation, he defended for his Strassburg degree ; Rousseau made it possible for him to appreciate to the full the primitive masterworks of poetry, the Bible, Homer, Ossian. The process which the young poet went through in these months intensified all his faculties, and rendered him extraordinarily sensitive to impressions. This is to be seen in the flood of poetry with which he surrounded at once the figure of the Alsatian pastor's daughter, Friederike Brion. The lyrics which Goethe wrote to Friederike, compared with the rococo verses inspired by Annette in Leipzig, seem to belong to another age and another clime. Friederike appears in the glorifying haze of this intense feeling as a Madonna of the poet's imagination; and although in Dichtung und Wahrheit the story may be suffused by a retrospective glamour which was foreign to it, we have Goethe's own letters to Friederike to justify the poetry in which he has enshrined his feelings for her. The love story ended, as it had to end, unhappily; Goethe himself realised that it could not be otherwise, when he seriously thought of presenting the Alsatian peasant-girl to his patrician family in Frankfort; and the laceration of feeling which the breach with her meant, initiated the young poet into that "sanctuary of sorrows" from which the greatest works of this optimist at heart so often emerged.

Meanwhile Goethe's academic career had reached its close; he had obtained the diploma which entitled him to call himself "doctor," and to practise as an advocate. He returned to Frankfort bringing with him the all but finished manuscript of his first important drama, Gottfried von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand. This work did not, however, appear until 1773, and then, condensed and altered, under the title Götz von Berlichingen.

12 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Götz von Berlichingen is the typical drama of the early "Sturm und Drang," as Schiller's Räuber is of the later development of that movement. It was not, however, put forward by its author as a drama for the stage, but as a dramatised reproduction of a chronicle; and it is thus hardly fair to regard it merely as a not very successful attempt to imitate Shakespeare. Goethe rather selected from Shakespeare's work those elements which appealed to him personally and responded to a need of the time. It may have been a strange obliquity of vision which allowed the "Sturm und Drang" only to see one aspect of Shakespeare's art, only his gigantic heroes and villains, and to be oblivious to his architectural construction which had appealed to Lessing's critical mind; but the European theatre had stagnated too long under the rule of artificial law, to leave room for much sympathy with laws of any kind. Götz von Berlichingen is Shakespearean only in so far as it attempts to present a great character by throwing light on that character from every possible side. And in doing so, Goethe took, one might say, unfair advantage of the Shakespearean method of constantly changing place and time; and he introduced contrasting figures regardless of their economy in the action as a whole. Everything, in fact, was subordinated to the development and display of the central character. But just this neglect of other considerations led Goethe into fresh difficulties ; for as his work proceeded he found himself more and more attracted by the subjective possibilities of the subsidiary character of Weisslingen, who soon became the most living and human personage of the tragedy. It required all the poet's self-denial to repress, in view of the unity of the drama, his growing interest in this Weisslingen, who sinned and suffered as the poet himself had sinned and suffered in Strassburg. Götz makes no pretence to be a historical drama in the modern sense of that word ; of those subtler elements that go to make up the picture of a past time, milieu, atmosphere, archaism of word and thought, there is little in Goethe's work ; it cannot be judged by the standards of modern historical realism. But what we do get in Goethe's tragedy is an extraordinarily vivid reproduction of the sixteenth-century chronicle, as it was reflected in Goethe's mind ; we see it translated, as it were, into terms of Rousseau and leavened by personal experiences. Goethe's theories of dramatic form and construction may have been extravagant aberrations of only passing interest, but in the great, unconscious art of drawing living people, Goethe revealed himself in Götz as a creative poet of the first order. It is in this power that the attraction of the drama still lies for us to-day.

14 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Goethe returned to Frankfort and made a beginning to learning the practical side of his profession. But it was clear that law had less hold on him than ever ; his university training behind him, it virtually ceased to interest him at all. Meanwhile he had gathered round him a circle of sympathetic and admiring friends, in Darmstadt as well as in Frankfort itself. Of these, Johann Heinrich Merck seems to have had the deepest influence on him. Merck had a sharp, ironic tongue and provided, like Mephistopheles to Faust, or Don Carlos to Clavigo, the antidote to that excessive revelling in feeling to which the enthusiastic disciple of Rousseau too readily resigned himself. In all Goethe's friendships antithesis of temperament formed a stronger and closer bond than sympathy : it was as if that desire for harmonious balance, which was so characteristic of him all his life long, influenced even the choice of his intimates. Goethe's literary convictions found expression in the criticisms of the Frankfurter Gelehrte Anzeigen, where the irresponsible iconoclasm of his views on books and writers is of less account than his apostrophic asides and monologues in his own person. He was not, however, disposed to take root in his native town, and he welcomed the proposal of his father that he should put the coping-stone to his legal apprenticeship by spending a few months at the Imperial Courts then established in Wetzlar. In May, 1772, he left Frankfort once more.

Wetzlar was no more calculated to stimulate in Goethe an interest in his profession than the lectures at Strassburg or the practical work in Frankfort had been. The business of the courts there stagnated, or was carried on so leisurely and with such inadequate resources that cases had been waiting more than a hundred and fifty years for settlement; there was little temptation even for a zealous jurist to interest himself in the procedure. But this mattered little to the young poet. Once more, as in Alsace, spring vibrated through his sensitive nature: and, Homer in hand, he let the new impressions meet and mingle in him. Friends he had, of course, in plenty, and they were not limited to the professional men he met daily round the dinner-table of the inn; wherever he went he was a welcome guest, and at this period of his life he seems to have had in a high degree the art of winning the hearts of children. It would have been surprising if, amidst all these crowding new impressions, love had not again, as in Strassburg, participated. This time his heart was set on fire by the affianced bride of one of the legation secretaries, Kestner, and a good friend of his own. Charlotte

Buff was the eldest daughter of the resident "Amtmann" or chief magistrate of the town, and had few qualifications for playing the sentimental heroine. Distinctly practical, she seems to have attracted Goethe by her cheerful, social qualities rather than by any real emotional depth; she pleased him best when surrounded by her younger brothers and sisters, to whom she acted as a mother. He met her on the occasion of a ball, to which it had fallen to him to accompany her; love, as was always the case with Goethe, was kindled at first sight, and his imagination did the rest. It is noticeable what weight Goethe usually ascribes to his first meeting with the women who played a rôle in his life; one cannot help thinking that they might have played that rôle even had no closer intimacy followed; in other words, the emotion was often, in great measure, a product of the poet's imagination. It is not easy for us nowadays to form a clear estimate of Goethe's passion for Lotte; his actual relations to Lotte and Kestner are so inextricably blended with the fictitious presentation of them in Werthers Leiden, that it is impossible to keep them apart. Even in Goethe's own memory, when he came to write his autobiography, the "Dichtung" was a more conspicuous factor than the "Wahrheit," and he all unconsciously ascribed to the real Lotte and his feelings for her, qualities which were only true of the imagined Lotte of the book ; it was certainly the imagined Lotte, not the real one, that brought her lover to the brink of suicide. Were it not that in after years Goethe spoke of his passion for Charlotte Buff as one of the deepest of his life, we should hardly be justified in regarding it as one of his more serious affairs. Goethe's whole nature was at this time so highly sensitised that even a passing fancy might have been capable of producing a work like Werther.

With Die Leiden des jungen Werther (1774) Goethe took the world by storm as no German writer before him had done. It is easy to say that the art of Werther is truer than that of Götz von Berlichingen because it is more photographic ; but such a judgment overlooks the subtle poetic transmutation to which reality is here subjected. In the first place, Werther is the artistic product of more than one phase of Goethe's own life. After the passion for Lotte in Wetzlar, from which the poet saved himself, as in Strassburg, by flight, he did not return direct to Frankfort, but paid a visit to Frau von Laroche, the friend of Wieland and one of the chief women of letters of the older generation. Here at Ehrenbreitstein, amidst new surroundings, the memories of Lotte were transferred to a new acquaintance, Maximiliane, the daughter of his hostess, soon to become the wife of Peter Brentano an elderly merchant in Frankfort. Some critics of Werthers Leiden would distinguish two phases in the novel, an earlier one inspired by Goethe's Wetzlar experiences, a later by his interest in Maximiliane; they find in the heroine of the novel, a composite picture of two women, or rather, a portrait of Lotte Buff merging imperceptibly into one of Maximiliane Laroche, an Albert made up partly of Kestner, partly of Maximiliane's later husband, a Werther partly the poet himself, partly the young jurist, whose death by his own hand first suggested the form of the novel to Goethe. But there is no outward trace of inartistic dualism in the characters of the novel; they are welded so skilfully that only a superrefinement of criticism is able to draw such fine distinctions. It would rather appear that in all external features Wetzlar and Goethe's life there provided the facts, while the subjective elements, the spiritual experiencings which give vitality to the book, were the more immediate impressions of Ehrenbreitstein. The heroine is, in other words, at heart more Maximiliane than Lotte; Albert more Maximiliane's husband than Kestner, while Werther is a fusion of two Goethes, a reflex of Goethe himself in two quite different situations. If Werther is a truer, more sincere creation than Götz, it is not because it is more of a photograph, but because it is built up on a truer intuition. In spite of the stumbling-block which the rather musty sentimentality of Werther puts in the way of the modern reader, it will always remain, by virtue of its sincerity and truth, one of the vital novels of the eighteenth century.

With these two works Goethe put himself in the front rank of German writers ; and life began to assume a new aspect to him. He was eagerly sought out by new admirers, such as Lavater, Basedow, and the two brothers Jacobi ; and from all he received quite as much as he gave. Lavater had, by infusing something of the sturdy individualistic spirit of the " Sturm und Drang " into the religion of the day, raised it, in Goethe's eyes, above the dull level of pietism and freed it from the depressing influence of Lutheran orthodoxy ; while from the younger Jacobi he learned to recognise in Spinoza the philosopher whose thought was most in harmony with his own.

Contrary to the expectations of his friends—and the mere disappointment of such expectations was perhaps the best sign of the healthy, growing state of Goethe's genius—he had not followed up Götz and Werther with works at all similar. The novel he gave up altogether ; and in the field of the drama he turned in the first instance to more modern and domestic themes. Clavigo was a play of Goethe's own time, indeed, so much of his own time, that the hero, a Spaniard mentioned in the Mémoires of Beaumarchais, was still alive, and heard with amusement that he was being killed nightly on German stages! Clavigo bulked less largely in the eyes of the world than its predecessor; but as a drama it is less open to adverse criticism than Götz. The restlessness of the Shakespearean technique has given place, under the influence of Lessing and Diderot, to a soberer sequence of scenes and events, which was better adapted to the eighteenth-century stage. In fineness of character-drawing the advance is even greater; instead of the broad, vague lines, which too often obscure the picture in the first drama, we have here miniature-like portraits; in other words, in passing from Götz to Clavigo Goethe went through the same development towards realistic truth which is to be seen in the transition from Götz to Werther. One has but to compare Clavigo with Weisslingen, or the two Maries with each other, to turn, above all, to the magnificent figure of Don Carlos, the subtlest that Goethe had yet drawn, to realise the advance. The dialogue between Clavigo and Don Carlos—especially in the fourth act—belongs to the most poignantly modern that the dramatic literature of the eighteenth century has to show.

Stella, ein Schauspiel für Liebende, is also, like Clavigo, a “modern” tragedy, and it awakened an unfair amount of contempt, abhorrence and ridicule, to which we in England, with our Rovers, contributed our share. But, quite apart from the fact that to the student of Goethe's personality in these years, this play—hardly excepting Werther, his most subjective "Sturm und Drang" work—has a quite peculiar interest, it deserves more serious consideration than it usually receives. It is at every point inferior in form to its predecessor, but in intention it is again a step forward in the direction of that finer psychological art of which Goethe proved himself in later years so skilful a master; Stella is, in this respect, a direct predecessor of Tasso. But it was, unfortunately, a mere hasty sketch, a drama born of the innate need of giving voice to his own difficulties and troubles; the poet allowed himself no time to reflect on his subject, and the conciliatory close which leaves the hero with two wives—however interesting it may be as an expression of advanced "Sturm und Drang" ideas—was too little in consonance with civilised conventions, to stand; Goethe himself realised how unsatisfactory his play was, and cut the knot by providing a new ending which converted it into a tragedy.

The lighter side of Goethe's temperament in these years, found expression in dramatic satires, in which he let his wit play alike round the fogies of tradition, and the too advanced pioneers of the new gospel of individual freedom ; and the " Singspiel," or vaudeville, provided an outlet for the lyric as well as the dramatic side of his genius. But more significant than any of these trifles were the various fragments of this period. Nowhere is the extraordinary richness of Goethe's inspiration more apparent than in the variety of the themes which he singled out for poetic treatment. He planned great tragedies on Socrates and Mahomet ; an epic on the Wandering Jew ; to 1773 belongs the noble fragment of a drama on Prometheus ; and, most marvellous of all, Faust was written in its earliest form, in these Frankfort years. The discovery, in 1885, of a manuscript copy of this "Urfaust" put an end to the speculations in which scholars had previously indulged as to the oldest form of Goethe's greatest poem. The Frankfort Faust virtually contains all the purely human elements of the tragedy ; the final polish is alone wanting ; and one cannot help thinking that the later additions have sometimes destroyed the freshness and simplicity of the original conception. Besides Faust, Goethe took with him to Weimar in a forward state of composition his drama of Egmont, and possibly also a sketch of what was ultimately to become Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre.

22 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

At the very beginning of the year 1775 there was kindled in Goethe's inflammable heart a new love, this time for a type of woman of whom hitherto he had had little experience. At first sight, it might have seemed hardly likely that Lili Schönemann, the daughter of a Frankfort banker, who moved in the gay social circles of the Frankfort plutocracy and had necessarily none of Goethe's interests, could have attracted him, or, having attracted him, have held him. Indeed, Goethe was conscious from the first of the disparity of the two worlds to which Lili and he belonged. Her circle was uncongenial to him, often repugnant ; he felt instinctively that to be bound up too closely with it, would inevitably mean an estrangement from the real work of his life. Her attractions, however, proved too strong, and events took the only course which they could take under the circumstances : Goethe became formally betrothed. The moment, however, that he felt himself bound, he began to realise the value of his previous freedom. A favourable opportunity for reviewing the whole situation objectively and dispassionately offered itself in an invitation from the two brothers Stolberg to accompany them to Switzerland ; and he accepted, hoping that the distractions of this journey might help him to face the world without Lili. He did not come as satisfactorily out of the experiment as he had hoped ; Lili was not so easily erased from his memory. But the conviction was at least strengthened in him that to bind himself irrevocably to her would be folly ; and, in the end, the engagement was by mutual consent broken off. The Swiss tour was extended as far as the top of the St Gotthard Pass, from which Goethe cast longing eyes down into Italy, the land of promise, which had had such magic attraction for him since his childhood.

Again the kindly fates that seemed to lead Goethe by the hand, interposed. The young Duke of Saxe-Weimar, Karl August, arrived in Frankfort, on his way to bring home his bride from Darmstadt, and invited Goethe to accompany him to Weimar on his return journey. Goethe held himself in readiness to accept the invitation. It looked, however, as if, at the last moment, a hitch had occurred ; for the messenger with the final summons did not arrive. Meanwhile Goethe felt that, whatever happened, he could not remain in Frankfort ; the break must be made quickly—if not Weimar, then Italy ; and he had actually set out on his southward journey, when the Duke's courier overtook him.

Schiller in his familiar classification of the poets, placed Goethe among the " naïve " writers ; but he did not take count of the fact that there was not one Goethe but a series of Goethes all differing from one another just in respect of this quality of naïveté.

The Goethe of these fertile Frankfort years was most naïve of all; he allowed no "sentimental" or reflective element to creep in between himself and his creative work. In those days poetry was for him, not merely a direct "confession," but a necessity. This explains the unique charm of this period to the modern reader; it is the reason why so many writers have preferred to study and discuss the "young Goethe" in preference to the riper, wiser Goethe of after years. The works he threw out then with such prodigality mean comparatively little to us to-day: but they are the best products of an age, the striving of which was to be fundamental, to get at the heart of things, to be done with untrue conventions and shams. To feel, to think, to act, in perfect harmony and with absolute singleness of purpose; to attune one's whole personality to nature; to be one with her—that was the ideal behind the "Sturm und Drang"; and it was Goethe's. Above all, to feel—all else was subsidiary. This disproportionate significance attached to the emotional, compared with the intellectual nature perhaps explains why Goethe, who in later years, attached such weight to the proper balance between the two, was in these years so exclusively a love-poet. His eroticism appears here against a purple background of renunciation and resignation; but the conflicts are, as yet, on the surface; they have not the subtlety and depth of his later searching of the heart. The supreme crime to the young Goethe was the crime which lay heaviest on his own conscience, that of lack of emotional constancy ; and it is the motive force which lies behind the tragedies of these years.

26 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

CHAPTER III

GOETHE IN WEIMAR TO 1786

EARLY on the morning of November 7th, 1775, before daybreak, Goethe arrived in Weimar. The break with Frankfort, with Lili, with the old ways of feeling and thinking, the old friends, has been made. An entirely new chapter began in his life. There is probably a good deal of idle gossip and exaggeration in the accounts of the "merry time" which followed Goethe's arrival; but there was not much room for seriousness of any kind in a small German "Residenz" under the old régime of the eighteenth century. The spirit of dilettantism made itself felt everywhere: dilettantism was the prevailing note in the fatherly, personal interest which the court and governing classes took in the welfare of the people; there was and could be no higher, serious political thought or action, no reason to hold strong party-views on any question at all. Consequently literature, art, social amusements, played a large part in the life of the town; and the universal attitude to all these things was that of the unserious, amusement-seeking amateur.

The young poet took on the colour of his surroundings ; he who, for a few years, had been looked up to in Frankfort as a leader of men, became an amateur among amateurs ; he, who had been the creator of elemental figures like Götz, Werther, Faust, Prometheus, found his occupation gone in the trivial atmosphere of this court ; a short time before bursting with creative energy, he lapsed now into a state of complete quiescence. In the fullness of time no one could be more merciless than Goethe in castigating dilettantism, but for some months at least, he was given over to it body and soul. He composed " Singspiele " for courtly amateurs to act ; he wrote a novel about a young man who becomes an amateur of the theatre ; and even the noble work with which a new epoch in his creative work begins, Iphigenie auf Tauris, was originally a pièce d'occasion written for and performed by amateurs, himself among the number.

The note on which Dichtung und Wahrheit closes, the famous words from Egmont : " As if lashed by invisible spirits, the sun-horses of time dash off with the light chariot of our destiny, and nothing remains for us but, with brave hearts, to hold fast to the reins and guide the wheels, to the right, to the left, from a stone here, a precipice there," was a constantly recurring one in Goethe's life, as indeed it could hardly fail to be with one whose career was so steadily favoured by fortune. Probably Goethe himself would have regarded the turn events now took, freeing him from the restrictions of his Frankfurt life, the disturbing passion for Lili and the intolerable paternal rule, as a manifestation of the good-will of the Higher Powers. But when one sees this young man of twenty-six, who had the world at his feet, who, in the brief space of four years, had shown such unexampled creative energy and given voice to such world-compelling thoughts, sinking into the amateur, one is inclined to question if Goethe's fate was a kindly one after all.

For a time there was, no doubt, a very real danger that Goethe would succumb to the temptations of this easy-going dilettantism. He had, however, an extraordinary power of righting himself; he was always able to rise superior to his surroundings; and before very long we find him beginning to rebel against conditions, to the pettiness of which he gave expression in Tasso, and which, in later life, in the Second Part of Faust, he caricatured. As soon as Goethe realised how little the ties that bound him in the first instance to Weimar, really meant to him, he might conceivably have turned his back upon the court and returned to that freedom which he had regarded as so desirable when he fled to Switzerland from the hemming conventions of a possible union with Lili Schönemann; and this was the more likely as the differences with his father began to assume a serious form, the latter refusing to send his son money. But the court influence had given place to other ties, which made a break with Weimar less easy. To the first place among these belongs his love for Charlotte von Stein, to the second Herder's acceptance of an invitation to make Weimar his home.

30 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

It is interesting to observe how the various women Goethe loved seem in turn to harmonise with the surroundings in which he happened to be placed at the time; they appear as poetic geniuses of place. Thus Käthchen Schönkopf is the embodiment of the Saxon rococo; the mood of Goethe's Strassburg life is concentrated in Friederike; that of Wetzlar in Lotte, of Frankfort in Lili; and now Weimar is reflected in Frau von Stein. Frau von Stein is usually described as the noblest woman whom Goethe ever loved, the most worthy of his love. And this is no doubt true. There has been much unnecessary writing to prove that this love of Goethe for a woman of mature years, the mother of seven children was more of the nature of an intellectual friendship; but the distinguishing feature was rather that the love for Frau von Stein began in friendship and respect, and that it made greater claims on Goethe's intellectual nature than his other loves had done. For the rest, one can follow distinctly through those wonderful love-letters of Goethe's to her—her letters to Goethe were almost all destroyed—the various phases, the warm, respectful friendship deepening into passion, until the moment comes when it threatens to close over Goethe's head and he is obliged to save himself by flight; the unhappy struggle against obsession then gradually gives place to a calmer objectivity, similar to the objectivity that brought tranquillity into his relations with Lili; and the end comes with the substitution of new ties.

It was obviously no mere platonic friendship that inspired the beautiful lyric poetry of this period of Goethe's life. Poems like Wonne der Wehmut or An den Mond may not be directly inspired love-poems, such as we owe to Friederike or Lili; but in these Weimar years a change had come over Goethe's whole attitude to the poetic expression of personal emotion; the purely subjective note has disappeared from his lyrics as from his dramas and his prose. The feeling that lies behind the poetry of this time is as deep and sincere as ever, but it is tempered by the growing objectivity of the classic artist in Goethe.

In no period of Goethe's life do we miss the steady documentary evidence of growth and achievement so much as here; his letters do not throw the right kind of light on his work for our purpose; his diaries are inadequate. We are consequently thrown back to a great extent on inference, in tracing the remarkable change that came over Goethe from the moment when he arrived in Weimar, with the yeast of "Sturm und Drang" still fermenting in his veins, to the period when he made good his escape to Italy in 1786. The actual literature he has left us from this period is restricted to a few beautiful lyrics and ballads, two or three "Singspiele," a charming little one-act comedy, Die Geschwister, and a record of a visit to the Harz Mountains. Besides these, it is true, we have Iphigenie auf Tauris in its earliest form and a first sketch of his novel, then called Wilhelm Meisters theatralische Sendung, of which a copy was recently discovered in Zürich; and we can infer with some degree of accuracy what was done to Egmont and Tasso in these years. But a record of this fragmentary nature is necessarily unsatisfactory and inadequate to establish even the most fundamental dates in the poet's development, such as, for instance, when exactly the "Sturm und Drang" in Goethe's life gave place to a soberer, calmer outlook.

We cannot but feel some disappointment in the literary leanness of the early years in Weimar, following, as they did, upon a period of such activity. It has been argued that, in this period, Goethe was deepening his spiritual life, enriching his experience, undergoing, in contact with men and the affairs of state, an educational process which was to leave its mark on his later work. The young Duke of Weimar, influenced by Frederick the Great's flattering patronage of Voltaire, gave Goethe a responsible share in the conduct of state affairs, and that in opposition to his advisers, who naturally and with justice thought that Goethe's precedents, his literary activity, his inexperience of routine, were not recommendations. And it is greatly to the credit of the Duke's judgment and a tribute to Goethe's many-sided genius and stability of character that the trust imposed upon him was not misplaced. Under the patriarchal conditions reigning in the Duchy of Weimar, Goethe was an exemplary minister of State. He took an active interest in affairs, showed excellent practical judgment in dealing with people, and his want of bureaucratic routine had, at least, the advantage of preventing him becoming the slave of it.

Moreover, this wider activity was quite in accordance with Goethe's own views ; at no time of his career did he regard himself as a man of letters pure and simple ; often, indeed, he imagined his chief strength lay in quite other fields. His constant aim was to live as full and complete a life as possible ; the writing of books was merely a concomitant accident. His ideal is nowhere more finely expressed than in his often quoted simile of the pyramid : " The daily work, which has been meted out to me, which becomes every day easier and harder to me, demands my presence, awake or dreaming. This duty becomes continually dearer to me, and in fulfilling it, I wish to be the equal of the greatest men, and in nothing greater. This desire to raise the apex of the pyramid of my existence, the basis of which has been given and laid for me, as high as possibly into the air, surpasses all else, and can hardly for a moment be forgotten. I must lose no time, I am already on in years and fate may perhaps break me in the middle and the Babylon-tower be left blunt and uncompleted. At least it shall be said : it was boldly planned ; and if I live, my powers, with God's favour, will hold out until I reach the top." This was written in September, 1780.

This conception of human endeavour and activity was inherently bound up with eighteenth-century humanism ; fullness, totality, was an essential element in the educational schemes of that dominantly pedagogic age ; any kind of specialisation or narrowing down of the activities of the individual life was abhorrent to the Rousseaus, Basedows, Pestalozzis and the authors of the various " Fürstenspiegel " in which the best ideals were mapped out for the benefit of future rulers of absolute monarchies. At bottom, this striving after universality of culture was only a development, on more humane lines, of the intellectual aspirations of the "Polyhistor" of an earlier generation. And just as there was a very obvious dark side to the polyhistoric ideals, so this later phase of universalism was not without its serious disadvantages. One cannot help thinking that Goethe the artist suffered at the hands of Goethe the philosopher, the statesman, the scientist. We are ready to recognise that the perfect artist is the rarest type of genius, and we know that Goethe had in him, all that goes to making the supreme artist in letters. We consequently resent the time occupied in taking over the duties of a minister of State, in studying drawing and painting, with a zeal that was not justified by the actual results, or even in controverting Newton, and forestalling Darwin. All these activities which might have been admirable in a lesser man, appear, to say the least of it, unfortunate in the greatest poetic genius of the eighteenth century.

It has been argued that Goethe's greatness in his own peculiar province benefited by these incursions into other fields, that his mind was broadened, his sympathies universalised. But looking frankly at the actual facts, we are obliged to admit that the contribution of such experiences to Goethe's poetic achievement was out of proportion to the energy he devoted to acquiring them. The great art-work of the world is, as Goethe himself well knew, conceived "im Dunkeln," or to use Schiller's expression, is "naïve," instinctive. Being a minister of State does not help a writer very far when he has to recreate in poetry the momentous events of history; on the other hand, it is usually just the common happenings and the common experiences of life that are best adapted to be transmuted by the poet into the pure gold of those unique and typical experiences which make great art. It may be frankly questioned if the universality of Goethe's interests and experiences added one inch to his stature as a poet; rather one might say that it was responsible for that interruption of his interest which led to long delays in the composition of individual works, to fragmentary incompleteness in not a few, and in still others, to an overweening deference to æsthetic theories and abstract considerations.

As the years moved on in Weimar, Goethe felt less and less satisfied with the primrose path into which his fate had led him. The bonds of amateurism became burdensome to him; and in his saner moments he may even have recognised that his statesmanship was, after all, only amateurism on a larger scale; that his boasted wideness of interests in art and science was but a frittering away of time, which in no wise contributed to the building and strengthening of the pyramid of his existence. He was a good enough judge of his own achievement to realise that the Iphigenie he had first written for the amusement of his amateur world, was too big a creation for such a world and that his own unique powers ought not to be squandered in ministering to an amusement-seeking court. Slowly, too, the truth was perhaps dawning on him that it is "in limitation that the master first shows himself," or that deeper conviction which came to him with increasing force as the years moved on: "I have really been born for an æsthetic activity." Here perhaps lay a truer reason for the feverish flight to Italy in 1786 than in the mere endeavour to get rid of the outward ties that bound and galled him in Weimar.

CHAPTER IV

IN ITALY ; “ EGMONT,” “ IPHIGENIE,” “ TASSO,” “ MEISTER ”

THE yearning for Italy runs through the German imagination of the eighteenth century, like a silver thread ; it provided a never-failing strain of romanticism even in periods of the most forbidding classic taste. In Goethe's case one might say that it was an inheritance from father to son, a longing first awakened in early childhood in the old Frankfort house with its Italian books and its pictures of Italy ; and he had been on the way to Italy, it will be remembered, when the final invitation to Weimar reached him in 1775. Italy, however, was too constant an element in the German literary mind for this to be a matter of accident. One might trace the love of the Germanic north for the south—the longing of the fir for the pine, as Hans Christian Andersen called it—back to the days when the Renaissance first cast its spell ; to the sober, uninspired seventeenth century, when Germany lay hidebound under the classicism of the Renaissance. Then it was that the Marinistic writers of Italy pointed out the way to freedom from the classic yoke, even although that way was a devious and questionable one. All through the eighteenth century, again, Italy, as the home of the antique, was the goal to which men like Winkelmann and Lessing looked, who sought in ancient Greek art a purification from the grosser elements of pseudo-classic taste.

To Goethe the visit to Italy was an event of magnitude—the central event of his life. We see this in the long spiritual preparation that preceded it; in his feverish anxiety at the last lest some unforeseen obstacle should thwart his plan, once it was conceived; in the haste with which the poet fled across the Brenner, and in his unwillingness to return to Germany. Possibly the attraction of Italy was not alone responsible for all this. The desire to flee the entanglements of Weimar life, its narrowness and provincialism, its diletantism; to break the tightening bonds of his relationship with Charlotte von Stein—these things, no doubt, had their share. But, once there, the delight of Goethe with Italy was unfeigned, unbounded. Every page of the Italienische Reise bears witness to it; he became for the time, an Italian among Italians, or, at least, a Roman among Romans. Rome was the first large city Goethe had ever seen; and the whole weight of humanistic traditions, education and taste combined to endear it to him, to make it appear what it still was in the eighteenth century, the veritable capital of the world. Not since the Frankfort days of "Sturm und Drang" had Goethe lived so intensely as he now lived in Rome, in the company of German artists and of the silent monuments of antiquity.

It has been said of Goethe's Italian journey that the most interesting thing about it was not what the poet saw, but what he did not see. He went to Italy pre-eminently on the quest of the antique; the great Renaissance sculptors and painters only attracted him in so far as he found in them a reflection of the glory of a still remoter past. Only for Palladio in Verona and Padua, for Michael Angelo in Rome did he feel something of that enthusiasm with which the ancient treasures of the Vatican and the ruins of the Eternal City filled him. But the Romantic Italy of the Renaissance he hardly saw at all; he visited Venice without being moved by the gorgeous canvasses of Paolo Veronese or Tintoretto; Florence meant little to him; Giotto and Botticelli he never mentions; Raphael alone receives a reasonable share of appreciation. In fact, it was as the disciple of Winkelmann that Goethe visited Rome, as the heir of a purely classic tradition.

Goethe had gone to Italy not merely to see; he sought a new philosophy and a new æsthetics. The old "Sturm und Drang" individualism had had its day with him ; he looked back on it with repugnance. Like all the great minds of the eighteenth century, he had the innate craving for law and order from which his youthful " Sturm und Drang "—at least so it now seemed to him—had been but a wanton aberration ; he sought again the shelter of the classic fold, and the ideal of art he found in Italy was but a reversion to the old Renaissance ideal, purified, ennobled and brought into line with the humanistic strivings of his age.

The supreme importance of the Italian Journey for Goethe's own personal life and development lay in the fact that he was able here for the first time to view himself objectively, to regard his achievement and ambition from a point of vantage. He busied himself, all his life long, with himself ; but rarely did he see himself so clearly and detached as now. In the midst of this new, strange milieu, he could look back dispassionately on all he had attained, and make plans for the future. One night in Rome, Goethe had a dream in which he saw himself sitting alone in a vessel ; this vessel was being laden by an invisible hand with splendid pheasants, whose brilliant plumage glittered in the sunshine. These pheasants, so he interpreted his dream, are the rich impressions my life here has given me ; and with this vessel I will return to Germany and unload its treasures before my countrymen.

But just in the unloading of his vessel Goethe was to meet with one of the most disheartening rebuffs of his life ; for his countrymen would have none of his pheasants. He left Italy in 1788 with an intensity of regret, which shows how much he had been at home there ; he returned to Germany a stranger. He did not reckon with the fact that Germany had in these months not grown with him ; he found Weimar where he had left it ; found the German public still delighting in " Sturm und Drang " productions like Heinse's Ardinghello and Schiller's Rüuber, productions from which, in his newly-awakened classic ardour, he turned away in disgust. The consequence was that he retired within himself, disheartened and embittered. The passion for Charlotte von Stein had gradually burned itself out in Italy, where lighter loves weakened his memories of her ; and on his return to Weimar he found solace in a new companion, Christiane Vulpius, who at least made no demands on him comparable with the obsession of his pre-Italian days. In this new tie an unexpected change made itself felt ; by degrees Goethe found the quiet domesticity which Christiane was able to offer him, indispensable to his well-being ; and it proved a more solid bedrock of happiness than romantic passion or even intellectual sympathy. Where so little was asked for, the disturbing element of change was eliminated, and Christiane, unworthy as she may have been to be his companion, became the helpmate of his life. His marriage with her was not, however, solemnised until later, and years had to pass before her companionship really influenced Goethe's life beneficially. The period which immediately followed his visit to Italy was an unhappy one; he was more completely out of tune with his world than he had perhaps ever been before. He turned away from poetry, and buried himself in scientific studies; and these afforded a surer refuge from the distractions of his psychic and emotional life, than that confessional of poetry in which, in earlier days, he had found a panacea for all ills.

Thus the importance of the Italian Journey for Goethe's life can hardly be overestimated; it was perhaps the very greatest event in his whole range of experience. This is abundantly evident from the works which owed their completion to Italy; and these—above all, Egmont, Iphigenie, Tasso, and in a lesser degree, associated with Italy, Meister and Faust—remain his most vital creations, the creations that have best stood the test of time. In comparing them with the writings of his "Sturm und Drang" period, or still better, with the "Sturm und Drang" form in which three of them were originally conceived, we are conscious of a complete change in the poet's standpoint to his work.

44 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Goethe has now abandoned or lost that phenomenal spontaneity which compelled our admiration in Götz, Clavigo and Werther. His work has ceased to be the realistic presentation of things seen and experienced, in which the pure imitative instinct alone guides his pen; it has now been invaded by æsthetic principles of composition; it has become a mediate, self-conscious art.

Egmont is obviously the work which first claims our attention; for it is, in all essentials, a product of Goethe's "Sturm und Drang." What was added at a later date, although significant for Goethe's development, does not add to or detract materially from our estimate of the play as it was conceived in Frankfort. The labours of modern scholars have, moreover, defined pretty accurately the growth of the play, in separating out the elements added in Weimar and Italy from the original Frankfort matrix. But with this, we need hardly concern ourselves. The charm of the drama, which is due almost exclusively to the personality of its hero, has nothing to do with those widening political and artistic ideas which left their traces on the last revision. Of all Goethe's dramatic works, Egmont has perhaps the least claim to the designation of drama; from the point of view of construction it is defective in the extreme; it sins against the established tenets of dramatic technique; and it has hardly even a plot. But just in these very defects we see how necessary caution is in judging the vagaries of a creative artist; for Egmont is no failure, and there have been critics, like the French romanticist Ampère, who have placed it at the very head of all Goethe's dramatic writings. In fact, Egmont atones for its lack of construction by a quality which is infinitely rarer in poetry, that instinctive power of visualising, of placing living men and women before us, of which Goethe had given a foretaste in his earlier "Sturm und Drang" plays. Graf Egmont and Klärchen, are still amongst the most delightful figures of the European theatre; for Goethe has succeeded in conveying to us that magnetic quality in their personalities, which they manifest in their relations to each other. These characters alone outweigh the tendency to theatrical convention in Alba, or the unreal opera-like close of the whole, a close which shows how difficult it was for Goethe to see the world he peopled from the point of view of tragedy.

It is with Iphigenie, however, that we emerge into the clearer, serener atmosphere of Italy. The drama, as has been already indicated, owed its origin to the early years of Goethe's life in Weimar; but it passed through several phases, was turned from verse into prose, and from prose back again into verse. And through these various stages we see the ultimate masterpiece emerging from a form not very different from that of the pseudo-classic plays of the eighteenth century, French and German. The perfecting of Goethe's Iphigenie is a testimony to the value of externals in poetry ; for the matter of the drama changed but little from first to last ; and yet how vast is the difference ! Obviously Goethe approached literature here from a quite other standpoint than in the days of Götz and Werther : then " nature " was his ideal ; now " nature " matters little or not at all. The goal has become concentrated poetic thought, perfection of form and execution. And we have to admit that in this case, exquisiteness of form more than makes up for the lack of the spontaneous realism in the creations of Goethe's youth. On Iphigenie there lies a peculiar consecration : every thought, every word, every gesture is attuned in harmony ; here is style in a sense not common to the literatures of the north, style as we know it in the masterworks of Greece and Italy, of France and Spain. The glamour of this poetry throws a spell over the modern reader as of a Greek temple ; before such pregnant, melodious verses, such calm evenness of execution, criticism, for a time at least, is dumb.

But when we look more carefully into the poem, we see that it is not built on so sure a foundation of poetic truth as we may at first have been inclined to believe. To begin with, we are tempted to ask what could have induced Goethe to revive this, surely by no means the most modern or adaptable of the old Greek drama-sagas? It was not Goethe's way to approach any work in the manner of a literary artisan; he wrote nothing that was not prompted in the first instance by some experience of his own. Now, the point of subjective sympathy in the story of Iphigenia was clearly the psychic problem of Orestes' fate. Goethe had himself been an Orestes; he had fled from Friederike, from Lili, and was haunted by remorseless furies; and he had found healing in the calm nobility of Charlotte von Stein's presence, as Orestes in the presence of his sister. Here was the subjective motive from which the drama sprang. But we would do well not to overstrain what might be called the biographic interpretation of Goethe's work. Goethe's remark that all his works are but fragments of a great confession, has led to a tendency to fix the originals of the men and women of his books which can only be deprecated. There was some reason—although this too must be narrowly limited—for discovering portraits in the works of "Sturm und Drang," but after Goethe left the "Sturm und Drang" behind him, such identifications are often seriously misleading. To find the problem of Orestes' life foreshadowed in the poet's own experiences and trials, to say that traits in Iphigenia herself were borrowed from the woman whose love inspired Goethe's early Weimar years, is one thing : it is another to say, as many of Goethe's critics are inclined to do, that Orestes is Goethe, Iphigenia Charlotte von Stein. Indeed, Iphigenia is most emphatically not Charlotte ; there is more of the classic tradition in her than of any flesh and blood model. That very touch of superhuman priesthood with which Goethe has endowed her, that calm that betrays no joy at seeing her lost brother, nor sorrow at her mother's murder, is tradition, and was not invented by Goethe.

Although we must be wary in explaining by mere rule of thumb the infinite variety and subtlety of a poet's relation to reality, we are at the same time able to feel at once what in Goethe's poetry is experienced and what is only invented. If this feeling does not betray us in the present case, we should say that Orestes alone is experienced ; Iphigenie herself not at all, except perhaps in her relation to Orestes' healing.

Or, to look at the problem of the drama in a wider, more comparative spirit, what has Goethe attempted to do ? He has endeavoured to modernise a Greek tragedy in the light of the philosophic humanism, which suffused the whole century of enlightenment. He has realised, as Schiller did later in his classic tragedy Die Braut von Messina, the incompatibility of Greek fatalism with the modern, Christian conception of man's free will; and the climax of his Iphigenie is brought about by an act of free will on his heroine's part, which is inconsistent with the fate-background. Had Goethe still held to the uncompromising realism with which he set out in life, Iphigenie might never have been written. But Goethe here becomes an advocate of the idea of moral regeneration so beloved of German classical poetry. He will have us believe that the innate nobility of his heroine's soul is alone sufficient to disperse the Furies and heal Orestes, that—as he summed the matter up in the motto of later years: “pure humanity atones for every human frailty” (“jedes menschliche Gebrechen”). But does it, or could it, unless in the eyes of an inveterate optimist like Goethe? To the modern mind the story of Iphigenia is and only can be tragic: it is true, Euripides avoids a tragic close: but it is surely not too much to say that the instinct of the Greek tragic poet would have preferred a tragic close had tradition not decreed otherwise. As it is, the Greek play ends ironically. But neither Greek precedent nor common-sense realism could have led a modern poet to choose deliberately the improbable, artificial method Goethe has adopted of bringing his drama to an end. Iphigenia here asserts the power and majesty of the truth: she cuts the tragic knot by being frank and straightforward: but in so doing she involves herself in a risk, which in the whole history of tragedy has never been known to avert the catastrophe; she puts the gods to the test, and depends entirely on their justifying her temerity. In other words a mere chance, not the grim, eternal necessity of Greek tragedy, brings Goethe's drama to a conciliatory close.

This summary statement of modern critical opinion on Goethe's Iphigenie points to the conclusion, that, however deeply we may fall under the spell of this modern treatment of a Greek tragedy-theme, we must seek in it no final solution of the problem that will hold good for all time; but only an interpretation of it in the light of that classic humanitarianism of which Goethe himself is the greatest exponent. It is an eighteenth-century interpretation of Greek tragedy, no more Greek at bottom than the seventeenth-century interpretations of the French stage, or, for that part, of the realistic versions of the Greek drama in the German theatre of to-day. Goethe's Iphigenie remains an unmistakable product of an age of humanitarian enlightenment.

After Iphigenie came Tasso, which belongs to a distinctly later phase than its predecessor. Goethe, it might be said, did not go to Italy to finish Iphigenie, only to realise it : Tasso, on the other hand, was an actual product of Italy. What was written of it before Goethe saw Italy, was inconsiderable, at most the two first acts, and not all of them ; in its most essential elements it was conceived and planned in Rome, and it was not completed until after Goethe returned to Germany.

It would be idle to claim that Tasso is, in the judgment of modern Germany, a more vital play than Iphigenie. It is less frequently played upon the stage, and it is lacking in that perfection of form which we have described as the saving virtue of the earlier work. Superficially, and on a first reading, it would also seem to stand not much nearer to us to-day than Iphigenie. That drama had dealt with a well-worn theme and characters drawn from a remote antiquity, and presented them in the light of a social optimism, which was distinctly of the eighteenth century ; in Tasso Goethe gives us, against the background of the Italian Renaissance, a picture of the ripe culture and delicately harmonised etiquette of an eighteenth-century court—an etiquette which vanished from European society at the French Revolution, never to return again. This, it might seem, is hardly likely to make more appeal to us moderns than the conflict of humane Greek and barbarian Scythian. But there is a modern element in Tasso which especially appeals to us now, and that is the extraordinarily intimate subjectivity of its portraits. In this courtly, old-world milieu, a very modern soul is entrapped and imprisoned.

The story of Goethe's Tasso is almost as briefly told as that of Egmont; indeed, it has no proper dramatic action according to the traditional definition of what constitutes a plot. A supersensitive poet is wounded in his amour propre, loses his balance, and makes presumptuous love to a princess, the sister of his patron; he draws his sword on an opponent, his patron's minister, ultimately to learn that the latter, the practical man of the world, is his best friend. But just in respect of this "actionless" plot, recent criticism seems to have arrived at a fairer judgment than that of a generation ago. It is becoming clear to us that the whole development of the higher European drama since Goethe has been in the direction foreshadowed by Tasso; the theatre is learning to dispense with visible happenings in favour of a more subtle form of dramatic action, situation and conflict, which takes place in the minds and souls of the characters. A master-tragedy like Hebbel's Gyges und sein Ring, or that most perfect, perhaps, of all modern tragedies, Ibsen's Rosmersholm, has little more action, in the accepted sense of the word, than Torquato Tasso. Indeed, viewed from this standpoint, Goethe's drama suffers, if anything from an excessive fullness of psychological movement.

But more serious reproaches have been brought against Tasso than its want of action. Almost every reader, who comes fresh to it, feels that it falls asunder into two halves which it is difficult to reconcile with each other ; in other words, that the drama which Goethe conceived in the pre-Italian days in Weimar, has not been successfully blended with the later development. The character of Tasso's opponent, Antonio Montecatino, seems lacking in consistency ; there are two Antonios who stand out quite distinctly from each other. But this confusion is probably due in great measure to the fact that the reader, mindful of the close where the poet resigns himself to the guidance and superior wisdom of the statesman, feels that Antonio ought throughout to enlist our full sympathy, which of course, he does not. Of all Goethe's contrast-figures, such as Carlos, Werner, Mephistopheles, none is more subtle and complicated than this ; but the subtlety is less due to the character itself than to the fact that it is varnished over with a polite court etiquette, which necessarily obscures the real man. The problem is, no doubt, simplified, if, with some modern critics, we strip Antonio of those idealising qualities which earlier opinion attributed to him, and regard him as an unsympathetic and even cruel antagonist of Tasso; let us admit frankly that the last monologue in which the poet clings like a ship-wrecked mariner to Antonio, is only one more of the aberrations of Tasso's life, that here too, disillusion will come and come speedily. From such a point of view—which, however, Goethe himself makes it very difficult for us to adopt—the confusion in Antonio's character and rôle no doubt disappears. The most serious flaw of the drama, and the real difficulty, is its close. It suffers under Goethe's imperturbable optimism, suffers as Faust, Egmont, Iphigenie had done. Strong and clear-headed as Goethe was, he had not, as he himself confessed, the ruthlessness of the tragic poet, which lesser geniuses like Schiller, Kleist, Grillparzer and Hebbel all possessed in a higher degree. After Werther and Clavigo Goethe never again braced himself to a real tragedy, such as compels our fear and pity; and none of Goethe's greater works suffers more palpably from this want of the tragic than Tasso. There was but one ending to the embittered conflicts that are here unrolled, conflicts unillumined by any spark of consolation, and that is the ending which history itself offered; had the doors of the madhouse closed on Tasso instead of the poet leaving him clinging distractedly to a forlorn and elusive hope, Goethe's drama would have gained infinitely in strength. The healing of Tasso may have been the healing of the poet Goethe in Italy, but we should have willingly given this subjective touch in exchange for the greater truth of Werther. The conflict is the same here as in Werther, Goethe's one, real tragic conflict, that of the sensitive, finely strung "superman," with the unsympathetic world of reality. The unbalance of the poet's soul is, as in Werther, the source of all Tasso's suffering. Tasso is a calmer, maturer Werther, for the poet himself had grown older and wiser since those early days when a god had given him so liberally "the power to say what he suffered."

In spite of Goethe's careful and often subtly ingenious use of his Italian sources, there is little that is historical about his Tasso. On the other hand, there is more of Goethe's own self in Tasso than in Orestes; and there is at least a suggestion of Karl August and the minister Fritsch in Alphons and Antonio. But here again we must be careful not to carry such analogies too far. What Goethe has given us is no mere copy of reality; and it is impossible to take stock of the thousand and one factors that blend and group themselves in a poet's mind before they emerge in the form of creative work. It is enough to say that in this poem Goethe has produced the most wonderful drama of a sensitive poet's conflicts that the literature of the world has to show ; he has sounded depths which poetry had not before attempted to sound.

While in Iphigenie and Tasso, we see the ripe product of what Italy meant for Goethe's art as a poet, we have to turn to another work to see what might be called the ethic results of the Italian journey, namely, to Wilhelm Meister. It has been claimed for this novel that it contains the quintessence of Goethe's wisdom acquired in Italy. This is true, but by wisdom we must understand the practical wisdom of life, not the peculiar wisdom that makes the artist great. Wilhelm Meister, however, shares with Egmont the characteristic of having been very fully written at a much earlier period ; and it was not taken in hand again until some years after Goethe had returned from Italy. Its publication was contemporary with the beginning of Goethe's friendship with Schiller.

There is no work of Goethe's in the case of which it is so difficult to arrive at a final judgment as Wilhelm Meister. One has only to recall the extraordinarily varied and contradictory judgments of the last century, the passionate appreciation of the early romanticists and the cynical indifference of "Young Germany" ; or amongst ourselves, the valiant defence of Carlyle and the disparaging sneers of De Quincey. That a work should awaken such warm partisanship for and against, such enthusiastic admiration and such antagonism, is in itself a testimony that it possesses the germinative qualities of great literature ; it is all the more reason that we should face the problem of its place in literature once more.

From the point of view of literary art Meister has many and grave shortcomings. Goethe himself did not by any means regard it as perfect ; he complained, in the days when Scott was attracting the eyes of all Europe, that he had had no romantic Scotland to draw upon when he wrote his novel ; not realising that it was he himself in his own romantic days who had pointed out the way which Scott followed. But modern criticism is hardly likely to regard it as a shortcoming of Wilhelm Meister that it has nothing of the romantic halo of the Waverley Novels. Like so many of the poet's greater works, it suffered under the length of time it was in the making, and under the consequent change of plan. This is the real source of its weakness. Not only was the time-gap between the plan and the final completion a wide one ; but a novel, unlike a drama, does not admit of the same complete revisal ; it is impossible to bring all its complicated ramifications, its incidents, its style, into line. Consequently the want of unity is more apparent and disturbing. There is reason for believing that the inception of the romance dates back to that intensely productive period of Goethe's life, his Frankfort years; that Wilhelm Meister was conceived immediately after Werther. However that may be, it was, at least in its first form, to be a novel about the theatre, and the "Sturm und Drang" had forced this institution into the forefront of contemporary interest as never before. A lucky accident has preserved for us Goethe's novel, if not perhaps in its very first plan, at least in the form in which Goethe brought it to a conclusion a year or two after he settled in Weimar; and this early version makes clear that Wilhelm Meister was begun quite frankly as a novel of the theatre. This fact exonerates the excessive technical detail with which the theatre is discussed, a detail including, however, as we must gratefully acknowledge, the masterly criticism of Hamlet, which has formed one of the starting-points for modern Shakespeare exegesis.

When Goethe resumed work on his novel after a pause of some seventeen or eighteen years, the theatre had no longer the first place in his interests, while his thoughts on the serious problems of life had gained in depth. Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre ceased to be, in the first instance, the story of an amateur's apprenticeship to the art of the theatre, and become the apprenticeship of a young man to the most difficult of all arts, the art of living. The centre of gravity passed from the æsthetic to the moral. Moreover, the general venue of the work had widened ; it was no longer limited to the free and easy life of wandering actors in contrast with the staid respectability of the man of business. Goethe attempted a completer picture of eighteenth-century society with its sharply drawn dividing lines ; he introduced a contrast—and Goethe is always admirable in drawing contrasting milieus—more vital to the century than that of artist and burgher, by bringing together burgher and aristocrat ; and between these two milieus Wilhelm moves to and fro. His education is completed by contact with them. Like Saul, the son of Kish, he had gone out to find his father's asses, namely, the art of the theatre ; what he did find was the kingdom of life.

But however we may appreciate the ethical deepening of the work, we are justified in the criticism that the book has suffered artistically by the superposition of ideas originally foreign to it. The best parts are undoubtedly those delightfully fresh descriptions of Wilhelm's doings among his actor friends. The new element, which bulks most largely in the revised novel of 1796, the aristocratic element, is disappointing. Here all is shadowy ;

the Lotharios and Aurelies and Nathalies are the merest paper creations, shadows like the anæmic personages of quite subordinate works of the poet, such as the Unterhaltungen deutscher Ausgewanderten. Their introduction may have brought variety into the picture, and meant a widening of the ethic problem and scope ; but they are no artistic gain. Whatever Italy did for Goethe, whatever ripeness it brought, it seems to have effectually destroyed this peculiar creative faculty. Moreover, the closing books are supplemented unnecessarily by the Bekenntnisse einer schönen Seele, a kind of padding to which Goethe, as the years crept on him, became increasingly addicted ; and the freemasonry with which the book closes appears to us now only unreal and tedious.

But there is something enigmatic about this varicoloured work, something that always evades our grasp. We have no sooner satisfied ourselves by condemning its artistic formlessness and want of plan, than other aspects force themselves on our notice and compel us to return to the novel once more. It may be made up of the most ill-assorted shreds and patches ; but we have to confess that some of these shreds and patches, judged by themselves, are extraordinarily beautiful ; it may be full of contradictory, or seemingly contradictory ideas on human morals—taking seriously what we consider should not be taken seriously, and the reverse—but it gradually begins to dawn on us that, in spite of its preoccupation with actors and idlers, it contains more vital ideas about the conduct of life in its widest and most serious aspects than any other work of fiction. Wilhelm Meister is, once more, an illustration of that persistent interest which clings to works of genius with all manner of loose ends and unsatisfied issues. It would be difficult to point to another novel of the eighteenth century, or, indeed, of the earlier nineteenth century, which has still such a well-justified claim on the attention of the modern world as this.

That Wilhelm Meister is Germany's representative novel there can be no manner of doubt. It seems to us now a kind of goal towards which the German fiction of the eighteenth century was unconsciously working; and the whole subsequent development of German fiction, through the dream-like fancies of the Romantic School to the modern social novel of Freytag, Spielhagen, and Heyse, after the middle of the nineteenth century, stands under the ban of Goethe's novel. The fact that, in spite of the powerful influences of French and English fiction, and, at a later date, of Russian, the German novel has been able to maintain a distinct national stamp, to retain its subjectivity and disregard for "well-constructed " plots—qualities which we so often unthinkingly condemn, because they do not happen to be French, bears testimony to the dominant power of Goethe's example.

CHAPTER V

THE FRIENDSHIP OF GOETHE AND SCHILLER ; GOETHE'S CLASSICISM

THE friendship of Goethe and Schiller, which continued unbroken and in a steady crescendo from the year 1794 to Schiller's death in 1805, is one of the most attractive episodes in modern literary history. At the first glance it would seem to belong rather to the might-have-beens of literature than to its realities that the two greatest poets of a nation should be thus bound together in the best years of their lives by a sincere and generous intimacy. One thinks of Goethe and Schiller as in the statue before the Court Theatre in Weimar standing hand in hand, the two leading poets of their generation, separated by a wide gulf from their contemporaries, united in alliance against the petty philistines, their common foe, and the sworn enemies of

Was uns alle bündigt, das Gemeine.

This period in the lives of Goethe and Schiller is enshrined in one of the most precious books of the German classic age, the Correspondence between Schiller and Goethe, which Goethe published in 1827.

The peculiar value of these letters is the fact that they afford us glimpses into the workshops of the two men, into their mind and art as poets, and supplement those admirable treatises of Schiller's in which the literary and æsthetic ideals of the age were formulated. Both poets had arrived at that level plateau of middle life when the unrest of youth is over, when plans are clearly defined and the unexpected no longer awakens disconcerting surprise. Theirs was essentially a sober friendship, an intellectual companionship; the passionate confidences of youth were no longer possible; and an inner sanctuary in each poet's life was always kept sacredly veiled from the other. The intimate personal tone which Schiller adopted towards Körner, and Goethe even towards so late a friend as Zelter, is absent. This aloofness in matters of personal intimacy is more noticeable in Goethe; even when he writes of literary matters, he is rarely discursive on his own work and plans. Schiller is disposed to be more communicative, but—in the earlier stages at least—he is a little overawed by his friend's greatness; and Goethe does little towards putting him at his ease. One may even detect a tendency on the younger poet's part to hero-worship and incense-burning, as in the devotion with which he reads and eulogises Wilhelm Meister, a work which we can hardly imagine would appeal so warmly to him as his letters imply. And Goethe accepts everything as his right, and in a tone often bordering on patronage. As the years moved on the intimacy increased ; but of the most intimate period, when both poets lived in Weimar, the correspondence has virtually nothing to tell us, for the need of writing letters had ceased.

At the outset of their friendship Goethe and Schiller made the discovery that, in spite of their very different temperaments, they did not stand at such irreconcilable extremes as they had believed ; and the repeated attacks of a petty, materialistic criticism, to which both alike were exposed, brought them closer. They routed their enemies in their Xenien, and then, in friendly rivalry, enriched German classical poetry with a series of ballads of rare beauty and classic form. Having thus found their way back to the poetic fold, the desire came to both to try their strength in greater works of literary art. Schiller set to work on Wallenstein ; Goethe wrote Hermann und Dorothea. The incalculable value of the mutual friendship was that it brought both men away from more or less alien fields, from philosophy, history, science, to the one art in which they stood on common ground, the art of poetry. Since his return from Italy Goethe had stood aloof from literature, like a sullen Achilles ; while Schiller was lost in the mazes of the Kantian philosophy. To Goethe we owe the stimulus that has given us the varicoloured series of Schiller's dramas from Wallenstein to Wilhelm Tell; to Schiller, not merely Goethe's Hermann und Dorothea and Die natürliche Tochter, but, most precious of all, the completion of the First Part of Faust.

Before turning to these poems, we must look for a moment at Goethe's life between his return from Italy and the composition of these works. Besides Tasso and Wilhelm Meister, works which in the previous chapter have been brought into connection with the Italian journey, Goethe made an admirable version in hexameters of the masterpiece of Low German literature, Reineke Fuchs; he polished and perfected the wonderful Römische Elegien, blending their note of Southern passion with his love for his new friend in Weimar, Christiane Vulpius. These little poems, perhaps the most unGerman of the whole classic age, form an even more personal confession of the Italianate Goethe than the larger works that have already been considered. And in 1790 he endeavoured, with, however, less success, to give these Elegies a successor in the Venezianische Epigramme. In the main, Goethe was immersed from the early nineties onwards, in scientific pursuits, and he attached more importance to his quest of a formula that should refute the Newtonian theory of light, establish the aqueous origin of the earth's crust, or demonstrate morphological unity in plants and anatomical continuity in the higher mammals, than to literary work. Poetry was but the occupation of his leisure moments, and, for the most part, not even that. When we follow in detail the records of the poet's diaries and correspondence in these years, we realise how much the modern reader, who prizes the poet Goethe above all else, owes to Schiller.

Hermann und Dorothea has been frequently described as Goethe's most perfect poem; it is at least his most perfect classic one. It is the direct outcome of those discussions of classic art which take up so large a part of the correspondence in 1797 and 1798; it is a carefully planned adaptation to German conditions of the style and art of the Iliad and the Odyssey. Goethe's hexameters are not, of course, Greek hexameters, still less Klopstock's; they are an adaptation of the Greek hexameter to modern German needs and German rhythmic feeling. There is nothing Greek about the theme; it is nationally German, and brought skilfully into touch with the great event that filled men's minds in these years, the French Revolution. The story itself was originally about Salzburg emigrants; Goethe transfers the scene to the Rhine. Hermann, the son of the Landlord of the "Golden Lion" in a German village, finds his bride among a party of fugitives from the other side of the Rhine, fugitives from the anarchy and horrors of France. This slight story is symmetrically shaped and modelled, and apportioned into nine cantos, each of which bears the name of a Greek muse. Over the whole lies a fine veil of harmonious style, which eliminates from the story the crude reality of actual happenings; the idealisation of a placid, optimistic art invades every corner and cranny of the picture. The repugnance to reality, which had now become the corner-stone of Goethe's and Schiller's creed, is most noticeable in the characters of Hermann und Dorothea. They are all generalised according to principles and by methods similar to those which the Cartesian philosophy had imposed upon the literature of the French grand siècle. Hermann is no clearly drawn, unique individual, as Egmont had been, or Clavigo, —no subjective portrait of Goethe's own self, like Werther; he is, so to speak, not a German youth, but the German youth, a composite portrait formed from an infinite number of more or less representative individuals. In the same way Dorothea, whom it is unwise to associate too closely, as some critics have done, with Lili, is carefully freed from all individualising features. Even had Lili stood in the background of Goethe's mind, when he drew Dorothea, there is much less of her here than there is of Frau von Stein in his Iphigenie. The Landlord of the Golden Lion and his spouse are types; even the Apothecary, the most striking figure of all, is typically conceived. The scene is an idealised German village; and the poet himself would no doubt have repudiated any attempt, such as that recently made by an American scholar, to identify his locality.

Thus in all that concerns form, technique, and aim, Hermann und Dorothea is a wholly classical poem. In his lifetime Goethe went through three clearly marked phases of classicism, which correspond roughly with the general development of European classicism in the eighteenth century. In Leipzig he began as an adept in a purely French classicism or pseudo-classicism; his second phase is the classicism of Iphigenie and Tasso, which, in spite of somewhat questionable pseudo-classic origins, was chastened and purified by the teaching of Winkelmann, and, above all, by Italy; but this phase was still compatible with a very considerable infusion of subjectivity, and aimed rather at classic restfulness than at symmetry of classic form and classic generalisation. The third phase, that of Hermann und Dorothea, was born in great measure of theory; it is the culmination of a carefully built-up classic art, from which the intractable element of the naïve has been completely eliminated.

But just in this lack of naïveté lies a source of weakness for a poet like Goethe, whose supremely great work is naïve. It was not Goethe's métier to work according to theories; and his work under such conditions lapsed—as, for instance, Schiller's never did—into artificiality. With all its perfection there is a certain coldness about Hermann und Dorothea, which makes it less precious to us to-day than the more living creations of Goethe's "Sturm und Drang." If the world has to choose between work that is formless and extravagant, but true, and work in which the perfection of form is due to an artificial construction that smacks of theory, it will usually decide in favour of the former.

Moreover, by one of those strokes of irony which lend dramatic interest to literary history, there arose in Berlin and Jena a new literary school, the Romantic School, in the very year in which this masterpiece of German classic art appeared. The young Romantic movement was a protest against the classic idealism of Goethe and Schiller, and, as time went on, it suffused with an anti-classic individualism the whole poetic life of the new century. The two friends, however, were not so easily turned from their path; they persisted for a few years longer in their endeavours to establish a Græco-German art, carrying their theories to still more uncompromising extremes. In Die Braut von Messina Schiller measured himself with the Greek poets in their own domain, and in Die natürliche Tochter Goethe produced a play of the French Revolution on the severest classical and impersonal lines. He even avoided giving his characters names, lest the sanctity of type should be disturbed by the intrusion of individualising traits ; the last drop of that subjectivity which was the life-blood of Götz and Werther has been squeezed out. The drama of Pandora, which did not, however, appear till 1810, is even a step further on this same path, but then Pandora is frankly an allegory ; the subtleties of its poetic symbolism place it outside such criticism as we are justified in using of Die natürliche Tochter. The time, however, soon came when both Goethe and Schiller realised that the path they had chosen would ultimately divorce them wholly from the literature of their people. They gave up the quest of the Greek ideal ; Die Braut von Messina was followed by Wilhelm Tell, Die natürliche Tochter by Faust. With the appearance of the First Part of Faust all Goethe's classical aberrations were forgiven him : Faust was hailed as the crowning work of the national literature.

The death of Schiller, in 1805, made a break in the even tenor of Goethe's life. In losing Schiller Goethe felt that he had been deprived of one of his main supports ; even if Schiller's lofty, unworldly idealism, that "lost itself in the sky," was far removed from that realistic attitude which the older poet, in spite of his Greek theories, could not disavow, there was something inspiring and stimulating in living in intimate proximity to such an idealism. This, at least, is what we read out of that magnificent poetic tribute which Goethe paid his friend in his Epilog zu Schillers Glocke.

Tasso has been described above as Goethe's most modern drama; one might in the same way single out Die Wahlverwandtschaften ("The Elective Affinities"), which appeared in 1809, as his most modern novel, the novel which is most in sympathy with recent developments of literature. Die Wahlverwandtschaften is a purely psychological study, a forerunner of those probings into the emotional workings of the soul which have distinguished the masterpieces of Russian and French fiction in the past hundred years. But it is modern, too, even in the superficialities of theme and treatment; it discusses with a seriousness unknown to the eighteenth century, problems of marriage and sex, and makes an effort to explain on psychological, not sentimental, grounds the problems it raises. Goethe approaches his theme as a scientific observer; he arranges an experiment in sex-attraction, as a pathologist intent on establishing new laws, and, note-book in hand, he registers each phase in the experiment. As a chemist might place four elements together and observe them follow out their natural affinities, so Goethe here brings together, two men and two women. The love which had in earlier years drawn Eduard and Charlotte together, has gradually died out; the circumstances of their lives had forced them to form other ties; and now, in later life when they find themselves free to marry, they are brought together by old associations rather than love. The bond that unites them is, as it were, sufficiently loose to leave them open to find other affinities. And these appear in a military captain who joins their circle, and Ottilie, Charlotte's young foster-daughter. These four human beings are Goethe's materials, and now he stands aside and watches what happens. It is unfortunate that so well-planned and interesting an experiment in life and manners should suffer from what we have called the anæmic qualities common to all Goethe's post-Italian creations. The figures of the novel resemble, in their shadowy unreality, those of the later books of Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre. The theme and problems were worthy of a better framework than that which Goethe has given them; there is something repellently artificial about the development of the story; it is constructed like the estate on which Eduard and the Captain lavish so much thought, that is to say, it is a conscious imitation of nature, which only conveys the impression that it is not nature. It must be admitted, too, that, as the book progressed, Goethe shirked its difficulties; instead of weaving character and ideas into one whole, he has recourse to wearisome expedients, such as a diary. His wisdom had deepened and his intellectual horizon had widened, but the artist in Goethe had to pay for the gain. We read Die Wahlverwandtschaften now, as we read Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre, less for the pleasure to be derived from it as a work of art than for its ideas. In the same way, all the ripe wisdom in the additions to the First Part of Faust cannot hold the balance with the naïve realism which makes the Urfaust one of the most wonderful examples of spontaneous creation in the literature of the world.

In after years Goethe laid great store by the subjective element in his novel. "There is not a stroke in the Wahlverwandtschaften," he said to Eckermann, "that I have not myself experienced, but none exactly as it has been experienced." And although the post-Italian Goethe was but little disposed, or able, to make direct confessions in his books, there is truth in this statement; rightly read, the novel is an intimate confession of Goethe's own psychological experiences as a lover and a husband. Even its conclusions are flesh and blood of Goethe himself; for although Die Wahlverwandtschaften is a scientific experiment, it is, like all experimentation in the infancy of modern science, an experiment with the very definite purpose of proving an hypothesis. In other words, the novel has its "lesson." It is a demonstration of the majesty of nature's laws, a vindication of morality exemplified by a tragedy of uncontrolled passion, a "Tendenzschrift" against the laxity of the Romantic School and a protest against moral anarchy. Once more Goethe states, from still another point of view, the basic principle of his own rule of conduct: the salvation of erring man can only be attained through steadfast strength of will and purpose, through the power to "renounce." It is in this idea that the ethic strength of the book has to be sought, just as its value as a work of art lies in its emphasis of the psychological. And in both aspects it was a book of the future, rather than of its own time.

CHAPTER VI

THE LAST TWENTY YEARS

GOETHE'S old age was, as old age usually is, uneventful. Apart from the publication of occasional new books and new editions of early ones, its main events were the severing by death of old ties, ties that could not be replaced by new ones. In this period we are supplied with a fullness of information about the poet's life, as never before ; his correspondence was more voluminous than ever, and every fragment of writing coming from so famous a man was carefully garnered and preserved ; he was surrounded by friends who worshipped him and reverently recorded every word that fell from his lips ; and, as if this were not enough, he himself kept his diary with a fullness and detail for which there had been no time in earlier years. The fierce light that beats on intellectual thrones was never fiercer than in Weimar during the first thirty years of the nineteenth century. A lesser man might have come badly out of such an ordeal of publicity ; but no one can say that Goethe did not grow old with dignity. Perhaps, indeed, there was just a little too much dignity—a dignity that occasionally conveyed a false impression of Goethe's real self. With each year the circle of Goethe's friends and correspondents widened : travellers from every land of Europe visited the great man and put on record how he received them. He had left much of his pre-Revolutionary thought and feeling behind, but to one eighteenth-century dream he remained faithful to the last—cosmopolitanism ; as a champion of a " world literature," that was hemmed in by no narrowing political frontiers, Goethe entered readily into correspondence with the poets and men of letters of other lands. Indeed, so warmly did he welcome the genius of foreigners like Byron, Scott, and Manzoni, that critics at home were not unjustified in feeling a certain jealousy.

Goethe grew old unwillingly, one might even say with difficulty. His heart, his emotional sensitiveness, kept him strangely young, even after his hair was white, and his outward dealing with men had taken on a formality that seemed inconsistent with lyric effusiveness. But in 1811 he himself took a step, which showed that he realised that the years were accumulating on his shoulders ; he made a beginning to that summation of his life and activity which he felt was demanded of him by mankind, by collecting materials for his autobiography. It is trite to speak nowadays in superlatives of Goethe's Dichtung und Wahrheit ; it is no doubt still Goethe's most popular and generally read prose work ; the greatest confession of one whose whole literary work was one long confession. What Goethe meant by his title is still not altogether clear. Do the words " Dichtung " and " Wahrheit " mean that he intentionally set out to romance about himself, as for instance Bettina von Arnim romanced about him in her delightful book Goethe's Correspondence with a Child ? Are we to take Goethe's account of himself as in parts an intentional perversion of facts ? Whatever Goethe meant by " Dichtung," it has now been abundantly proved that it was not this. Goethe gave himself infinite pains to present as true and faithful a picture of himself as he could ; he had no intention to conceal the truth or to beautify it. But looking back through thirty and forty years, events, tinged with the light of retrospect, assumed no doubt in his mind an aspect which was not in exact accordance with the truth. The picture we obtain from contemporary letters and doctrines does not always correspond to the softened contours of the autobiography ; the young Goethe's joys were more tumultuous, his enthusiasms more heaven-scaling, his griefs more poignant than he would have us believe. There were harshnesses and crudities in reality which are here unintentionally toned down ; but the actual facts were not essentially different from what Goethe believed them to be.

It is doubtful, however, if this introduction of the factor of retrospect was what the poet had in view when he used the expression "Dichtung." What he meant was rather that he subjected the story of his life to a process not unsimilar to that which, in a higher degree, he had submitted the material with which he had dealt as a poet. He applied to his life the teleological methods of the historians of the eighteenth century: he interpreted events, that is to say, in the light of the one far-off event towards which all things seemed to move. "Dichtung" meant that, instead of putting down the facts in the empiric, unreasoning way in which all facts occur, he grouped them, ordered them, interpreted them, as so many stages in the evolution of a man of genius. He wrote of his youth as one who knew the ripe achievement of the life that followed. It was this subjection of reality to the harmonising interpretation of the poet, this subordination of the parts to the whole, that constituted Goethe's "fiction." And it is just in this ingredient, added by the artist in Goethe, that the perpetual charm of his work lies. Rousseau's Confessions, with its harsh record of facts, may be a more faithful record of the eighteenth-century mind and the eighteenth-century outlook on life; but the Confessions is no longer a living book in the twentieth century as Goethe's autobiography is.

We cannot but regret that Goethe did not carry his work beyond his early Frankfort years. It has been suggested that he felt reluctant to write of times and people so much nearer to him ; more probably he felt a difficulty in discovering the precise form of " Dichtung " which would throw the facts of his Weimar life into the light he required. We have, it is true, a kind of surrogate for the continuation in other documents, such as the Italienische Reise and the many volumes of Diaries and Correspondence ; but in spite of this, as all readers of Goethe's biography feel, that secret of higher interpretative truth has not yet been found that will bring Goethe's Weimar life into harmony with the period that preceded it.

From the closely woven background of Goethe's old age stand out three works of supreme interest, in which Goethe once more showed his skill in the three chief forms of modern literary art, the lyric, the novel, and the drama. These works are Der Westöstliche Divan (1819), Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre (1821-29), and the Second Part of Faust (1832). But these books by no means exhaust Goethe's activity in these later years. To his manifold scientific interests and his penetrating criticism we shall return in a subsequent chapter ; and even his minor literary work in this epoch is significant. Many modern readers will, indeed, turn rather to byways of Goethe's activity than to the larger works ; repelled by the socialistic philosophy of the Wanderjahre, or the allegory of the Second Faust, they may still find an inexhaustible source of interest and inspiration in the concentrated wisdom of the Zahme Xenien and the Sprüche in Prosa.

Der Westöstliche Divan represents the Indian summer of Goethe's lyric and emotional nature. It is a defiant protest against the encroachment of the years. Once more, at the age of sixty-five, the lyric chord in Goethe was touched by a new love, that for Marianne von Willemer, and his feelings found vent in a new lyric vehicle, the oriental poetic form of the Persian poet, Hafiz. The spontaneity of Goethe's first period cannot be claimed for the lyrics of the Westöstliche Divan ; it was not given to Goethe after his journey to Italy, to pour out his feelings as in earlier days. Perhaps, too, it is unfair to him to emphasise the amatory side of this interest which Marianne von Willemer inspired in him ; what has already been said of the peculiar, half-fictitious character of Goethe's various love-affairs is particularly applicable to the present case. The " Dichtung " predominates over the " Wahrheit " ; the fiction of the oriental singer is a real fiction, and not merely a veil behind which stands Goethe himself. Hatem, the lover, is not Goethe ; he is a creation apart from Goethe, as Faust is, or Wilhelm Meister, or Tasso ; Goethe observes the working of passion in him, as he had observed it in the characters of his Wahlverwandtschaften, and puts the results of his observations on record ; of the Divan, too, he might say there is "not a stroke in it which has not been experienced," but "not a stroke that has been experienced just as here described." Another interesting feature about this book is the concession it makes to the new Romantic movement. Goethe, as we have seen, had stood nominally apart from the young individualists who made so brave a stand against the stiffening classicism of Weimar ; but his was a Protean nature and extremely sensitive to the charm of novelty. He could not follow the advancing Romantic movement into occultism, and into excesses that recalled the "Sturm und Drang" of his own youth, nor had he much sympathy for the enthusiasm for oppressed nationalities like the Poles and the Greeks ; but the Romantic orientalism of Hafiz he could appreciate, and his Divan is in this respect a very genuine enrichment of Romantic literature.

In 1821 appeared the first volume of the long-expected continuation of Wilhelm Meister, Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre, oder die Entsagenden. But not for the first time in Goethe's life, not even for the first time in the history of this particular novel, Goethe had dallied too long. The real continuation of the Lehrjahre could only have been written immediately after the completion of that work ; it is essentially a novel of the pre-Revolutionary régime, a novel which reproduces the social conditions and ideas of the eighteenth century. A continuation written in the nineteenth century had, of necessity, to be a new work. The Wilhelm who in the first part completes his apprenticeship to life, was obviously totally unfitted to continue his "Wanderjahre" in the new century ; for that an entirely different kind of apprenticeship was demanded. The dilettantism of the theatre, the trite contrast of the idealising artist and the hide-bound man of business, the polite insincerities of a pre-Revolutionary aristocratic culture, were no preparation at all for the hero who had now to face nineteenth-century problems of human life and destiny. Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre, as originally planned in Goethe's mind, could not be written in 1821 ; and Goethe soon realised this. He made a beginning, but the old world was not to be brought to life again ; the figures receded into schematic vagueness and unreality ; their human relations interested Goethe himself little, and they hardly interest us at all. By their very ineffectualness they made the necessary break with the first part ; and that break being made, Goethe probably felt freer to make the book a mere vehicle for ideas and abstractions. The Wanderjahre contains his most advanced political thought and the most succinct statement of his views on religion; but that these ideas are expressed in connection with the Wilhelm Meister of the early nineties of the previous century, that the "pedagogic province" is created to educate that Wilhelm's son, means as little to us as that the Faust of the Second Part of that poem once loved Gretchen. It is difficult nowadays to discover what Goethe originally intended to do with his hero on his "Wanderjahre"; possibly he himself no longer knew, when he took up the thread again. In any case, the continuation of Goethe's novel remains the most fragmentary and unsatisfactory of all his continuations. The material was not even adequate for his purpose, and he supplemented it by the introduction of much irrelevant matter, short stories of small literary quality, which had been written in no connection with Wilhelm Meister and are merely introduced to fill out the volumes.

But Goethe's career was not destined to taper thus ineffectually to an end. In all the years since Schiller had first given him the stimulus, Faust had not been forgotten; it moved steadily forward, accompanying Goethe like that mirror borne along the highway of life, to which Stendhal likened the modern novel. The poetic transmutation of his spiritual life in this last period found its way into the Second Part ; and it is to us now only one more proof of the providential fate that favoured Goethe all his life long, that he should have been spared to put the finishing touches to this, the crowning work of his life.

When Goethe died, on March 22, 1832, it seemed to contemporaries as if an era in the world's history had closed, as if a new era in European thought and poetry had begun. The magnitude of Goethe's life-work it is perhaps even still difficult to gauge. He has left behind him a library of books bearing his name, greater than that even of Voltaire, and of greater variety ; more than this, he has called into being a vast literature about himself and his work of which the end is not yet. His long life goes back to the pseudo-classic era of Gottsched, ranges through Lessing's classicism, the new-birth of individualism with Rousseau and Herder, to the German " Sturm und Drang " whose leader and idol he became. And from " Sturm und Drang " Goethe led his literature back into calmer waters, back to a serene classicism, and a wide-hearted humanitarianism, in which the movement of the eighteenth century found its goal. Judged thus, Goethe is the continuer and perfecter of that great movement of humanism which, inaugurated by the Italian Renaissance, brought to each nation in Europe in turn, to Italy, to France, to Germany, its flourishing period ; to Goethe it was reserved to give the movement of the Renaissance its last and highest form. But this does not by any means exhaust Goethe's significance for the literature of Germany and of Europe. Had his life been cut short, as Schiller's was, in the zenith of classicism, it would be easier for us to-day to close the records over him, to round off and sum up his life. But Goethe belonged to two centuries, and came to an understanding with the nineteenth century as no other thinker or poet whose most impressionable years had been lived in the pre-Revolutionary era. More than a third of his long life was passed in the midst of the individualistic revival we know to-day as German Romanticism, the movement which succeeded and to some extent superseded Weimar classicism. And towards this movement Goethe's attitude was one of understanding and encouragement. He greeted and admired Byron, Scott and Carlyle ; his sympathies went out to the young Romantic dreamers who were preparing a great era for the literature of France, and to the Romanticists of Italy. Goethe, the poet of eighteenth-century Classicism, was also a poet of nineteenth-century Romanticism. He who had begun in the school of Leibniz and Wolff, who had grown up with Rousseau, lived through the period of Kant to that of Hegel, even of Schopenhauer. The poet whose ripest years were reached when the great Revolution broke over France lived long enough to see that other, less sanguinary, but spiritually hardly less significant, Revolution of July 1830, which broke the domination of Romanticism in European letters, and led poetry back into channels other than Romantic.

CHAPTER VII

“ FAUST ”

FOR those who will see Goethe's vast activity as a whole, the course here adopted of reserving his Faust for discussion in a chapter by itself may seem difficult to justify ; such readers might prefer to have the chief work of the poet's life woven into the texture of his biography, and instead of one Faust, have presented to them the three Fausts, that of Goethe's youth, of his middle-age and his old-age, each differentiated and set by itself. And, remembering what has been said of Goethe's life as the supremely interesting thing about him, their demand has a certain justification. On the other hand, something may be urged in favour of looking at the poem as the poet himself intended it to be looked at, as one indivisible whole, not as a record of personal phases, and we are especially justified in doing so by the fact that to the modern English reader Faust is Goethe. To know Faust is one of the most elementary and obvious duties of modern culture, even if our knowledge of Goethe begins and ends with that work.

Faust, like every great poetic creation, may be regarded from two points of view, the subjective or personal one, that is to say, in its relations to the poet himself, and the objective one, in its relations to the literary movement of its time. Both these aspects of Goethe's drama are alike interesting. Faust is the work of Goethe's whole lifetime; its beginnings date back to his earliest literary ambitions, and the finishing touches were put to the Second Part only a few months before he died. It is thus in quite a unique sense the poetic record of Goethe's emotional and intellectual life. At what date he first resolved to make the old story the subject of a tragedy it is difficult to say, but we shall doubtless not be far wrong if we accept the statement of Dichtung und Wahrheit that Götz von Berlichingen and Faust were the two figures which had the first place in the poet's heart in those eventful months he passed as a student in Strassburg in 1770 and 1771. "The significant puppet-play of Faust hummed and echoed in me in many tones. I, too, had wandered in all fields of knowledge, and had early come to see the vanity of them all. I had tried all kinds of ways in life, and had always returned more dissatisfied and troubled." Older memories from Frankfort and Leipzig were embodied in the poem, but its real birthplace was Strassburg, even if, as seems likely to have been the case, Goethe's preoccupation with Götz von Berlichingen left him but little time to give his ideas shape, until he returned to Frankfort. Here, between 1773 and 1775, he worked at the drama in earnest.

The most striking features of this Urfaust, as the early Frankfort version has been called, are its imaginative strength and the unity of its style. Fragmentary it may be, but it comes all from one mould. Goethe poured all his own personal "Storm and Stress" into his hero. He fixed in this Faust a definite phase in his development, and that with such abundance of subjective detail that any remoulding or continuation in later years had of necessity to appear as supererogatory patchwork. A simple human tragedy of overpowering pathos, this early Faust is the greatest achievement of Goethe's youth. There is nothing philosophical in it, no self-conscious wrestling with the enigmas of existence; even the problems which the old "Volksbuch" suggested are evaded. Mephistopheles, so far from being the philosophical devil with a mission, which he subsequently became, is merely the incarnation of a popular idea, an emissary of evil, who, by means Goethe did not take time to tell us about, has got Faust into his meshes and succeeds in wrecking his life and Gretchen's. Obviously the young poet was more interested in his lovers than in his devil, and he unfolds their fate with a tragic power which no other European poet of his time possessed ; the scene entitled later “ Trüber Tag, Feld ” is one of the most concentrated pieces of dramatic writing in the literature of the world.

It seems necessary, in view of the many volumes that have been written on the philosophic bearings of Goethe's Faust, to emphasise the absolutely unmetaphysical nature of its beginnings. There is an undoubted danger among Faust commentators to refine and philosophise overmuch. Goethe in his own day had to protest ; and it seems still more necessary to protest now. What makes Faust the greatest work in the German tongue is, after all, not its philosophy, but its art, its imagination, its poetry ; and these qualities more immediately appeal to us in this early form, because the later philosophic ideas have not yet been superimposed on them. The strength of Goethe's Mephistopheles lies in the fact that Goethe has fused the devil of the popular German imagination with a type of dramatic character, complementary to his own temperament, which, in his early period, he was able to draw with perfection, namely, that which we find exemplified in the character of Don Carlos in Clavigo. But Goethe would not have been the artist he was, had he not possessed in a high degree the Protean power of assuming many forms, of splitting up his own wondrously complex personality into many simpler component parts ; Goethe is not only Clavigo and Faust, he is also at the same time Don Carlos and Mephistopheles. It is well to read the Urfaust before we approach the completed poem ; for it affords a kind of æsthetic foundation, and prevents us being carried away by the philosophic speculations which the later phases of the poem induce.

The completed First Part of Faust, as it appeared in 1808, is, compared with the Urfaust, a veritable patchwork ; it is full of irreconcilable contradictions, and much more obscure in reality than the Second Part. On to the naïve tragedy of the seventies, Goethe has endeavoured to graft a philosophic purpose. And as his art gradually developed from the personal individualism of " Sturm und Drang " to the more objective methods he acquired in Italy, so the individual fates and sufferings of Faust gradually assumed a wider and more typical significance. The hero changes from a man in his best years to a brooding moralist, who requires a rejuvenating draught to make the original Gretchen tragedy possible at all ; the sharply-drawn popular devil of the Urfaust becomes a philosophically constructed incarnation of evil, and an evil, moreover, that is but part of a larger good. Faust's own attitude to the devil, originally mere heroic defiance, becomes vastly complicated by issues which extend far beyond personal responsibility and guilt. The simple moral issue of a wrong-doing which meets with its appointed reward, becomes a refined and complicated problem of the balance of good and evil in the world, the object of a wager between Heaven and Hell; and behind it all lies a wide generalisation of the meaning of guilt, as not a mere succumbing to temptation, but a ceasing to strive, an inability to rehabilitate oneself. In order to focus the old play to the new point of view, to give universal significance to what was originally merely an individual fate, to make Faust once more something of what the original Faust of the sixteenth century had been, a figure typical of the aspirations of his age, Goethe transformed his drama into a mystery play, or rather encapsuled the individual tragedy in a kind of envelope, which takes the form of two Prologues. The Prologue in Heaven, in particular, at once provided the drama with a vaster background. The problem of Faust becomes the problem of the Book of Job; Faust is now a puppet in the hands of higher powers; he is no longer an irresponsible agent, free to sin and work out his own salvation, but an object for whose possession the powers of Heaven and Hell contend. On earth God gives this devil, who, in accordance with that optimism, inherited by Goethe from eighteenth-century rationalism, cannot extricate himself from the mesh of necessity which makes him an agent of God's will, full power over Faust ; he may do his utmost to lead him downwards. If Faust withstands Mephistopheles's temptations, as God, in his Divine foresight, knows he will, the devil loses his wager.

The problem which the poet had now to face was, given Faust's personal fate as he had already described it, how was it to be brought into harmony with the defeat of Mephistopheles, which the problem of the poem demanded ? Obviously the Faust that we already know from the earliest form of the drama did not, in the ordinary acceptance of the word, succeed in rising superior to the tempter. But Goethe saw deeper now ; he saw that the mere yielding to the temptations of the devil is not the real ground for the repudiation of an erring sinner by God. Goethe gives, however, his devil the belief that this is so ; hence the self-confidence of Mephistopheles who knows, when he accepts God's wager, that he will have no difficulty in devising temptations which Faust will be unable to resist. The Prologue in Heaven had put the matter in another light. Such guilt as Faust involved himself in, or was to involve himself in, in relation to Gretchen, was no longer to be a ground for damnation, but only the falling away from God, which was to manifest itself in an admission on Faust's part that the issue of his struggle was lost. Not the yielding to Mephistopheles's temptations, in other words, was to constitute his guilt, but the blunting of Faust's soul by these temptations.

Thus the original tragedy of Faust, of the book-worm who, disgusted by the vanity of all knowledge, goes out into the world to be a man among men, and drink the experiences of humanity to the dregs, becomes a “ divine comedy ” of God's servant, a Faust in whom was embodied the best elements of eighteenth-century humanism. The new Faust is confronted by Mephistopheles, not as one who is ready to fling away the better part of life, but as a humanist, whose disenchantment has been temporary, who knows that his salvation lies in the fullest understanding of his fellow-mortals. The demands he makes on Mephistopheles, when he comes to sign the pact, are very different from those which the old Faust would have demanded, had Goethe worked out the scene at first. Mephistopheles offers himself now as Faust's servant. In the “ Volksbuch,” the devil undertook to do all Faust asked him for twenty-four years, and at the end of that time Faust was to fall into his hands ; but in Goethe's pact there is no limit of time, there are no concrete conditions. It would have been useless, indeed, for Mephistopheles to have dangled before the new Faust the trivial sensual joys which had entrapped the old one. For Faust has already run through the whole gamut of emotion ; from heaven-scaling jubilation to the pessimism of despair no emotion is foreign to him ; and the joys of the world seem to him as empty as its sorrows—illusions one and all. The only stipulation which it is possible for Mephistopheles to make, is that, if temptation ever succeed in drawing Faust down, in making him forget his aspirations, in destroying the natural elasticity of his soul, then, and then only, he may fall a prey to the devil. This is the meaning of the conditions of the pact :

If e'er upon my couch, stretched at my ease, I lie,
Then may my life that instant cease !
Canst thou with lying flattery rule me,
Until, self-pleased, myself I see,—
Canst thou with rich enjoyment fool me,
Let that day be the last for me !
Be this our wager. . . .
When to the moment I shall say,
“ Linger a while ! Thou art so fair ! ”
Then mayst thou fetter me straightway,
My final ruin then declare !

It would be impossible to defend the Second Part of Faust by applying to it the same criteria of great dramatic poetry which have been applied to the First. It is a shadowy, intangible poem, in which the characters are even more indistinct than the generalised types which people Goethe's post-Italian creations ; even in the case of the two protagonists of the poem, Faust and Mephistopheles, it is impossible to speak of continuity ; the Second Part virtually introduces to us still another Faust, as different from that of the poem of 1808 as the latter was different from the Faust of Goethe's Frankfort period ; even Mephistopheles has become a mere pale, philosophical ghost of his former self. But to be just to the Second Part, we must take up a different standpoint towards it. It is not to be treated lightly merely because it is conceived and written according to other ideals than the First Part. It contains verses even more wonderful, and often more melodious ; it is instinct with great thoughts that flash light on the dark places of human life and destiny ; it conjures up pictures of a vast and solemn beauty. We might have preferred a moving drama, pulsating with the vivid life that is to be found in the Gretchen tragedy ; we may resent the intrusion of philosophy and allegory, and regret that Goethe should have continued the most realistic, actual tragedy in the world's literature as a dream-like, intellectual phantasmagoria ; but our business is, after all, not with the Second Part of Faust as it might have been, but with the Part as it is. If it is an allegory, we must frankly accept it and judge it as such, not condemn it, before we have even tried to find the key to its meaning. Even the most cursory reader soon feels that there is some elusive mystery behind the vapid figures and incidents, which hardly awaken at all our emotional interest.

“People come to me,” said Goethe once to Eckermann, with whom he often discussed his work on the drama, “and ask me what ideas I have tried to incorporate in my Faust. As if I knew myself and could say. ‘From Heaven through the world to Hell!’ that is something, if they must have something; but that is the course of the action, not an idea. Or again, we might say, that the devil loses his wager, and that a man who, amidst serious errors and aberrations, always strives upwards towards better things, is to be saved; that again is a good and efficient thought which explains much, but it is not one which lies behind the whole and behind every scene. It would indeed have been a pretty mess had I been obliged to string, like beads on a single thread, all the varied and manifold life of Faust.” In these words Goethe gave expression to the repugnance of the artist to reduce his work to a formula, and also to the difficulty of providing a single formula which should explain a poem that had been written at widely different periods and according to very different plans. The simple moral issue of wrong-doing had, as we have seen, become a complicated problem of the balance of good and evil in the world, and the fate of the individual hero was merged in an allegorical presentation of human activity and ultimate salvation of the racial type. Goethe was never weary of telling us to “ become what we are ” ; that is to say, to make the utmost of the powers and faculties with which we happen to be endowed, to face life with that “ holy earnestness,” into which the hero of his greatest novel was initiated at the close of his apprenticeship. This is the practical philosophy which Goethe embodied in his poem ; Faust is saved by virtue of his restless striving, his insatiable greed of activity. More than this, Faust learns, in the course of the long Second Part—an allegory of human experience such as has never before or since been encompassed in a single poem—to be wisely active, to limit his practical activity to his “ God-given hest,” to ends that lie within his power. In other words, that, unquenchable as is and must be man’s striving, it can only become a great positive force in the world if it is guided by a higher wisdom that voluntarily recognises the limits of individual activity.

Between the tragic close of Part I. and the opening of Part II. a long period necessarily elapses, in which Faust is lulled back to mental and emotional equilibrium by the beneficent forces of nature. When we see him again, it is at the Court of the Emperor, where Mephistopheles’s object is to introduce him to a wider human activity, in which personal ends are subordinated to social. With Mephistopheles's aid he soon becomes an indispensable person at the court; he relieves the financial difficulties of the state by the introduction of paper money, and for the Emperor's delectation conjures up Helen of Troy. All this is embedded in a kind of masquerade which leaves us entirely cold nowadays, but which had a peculiar fascination for the German mind in the earlier years of the last century. The masquerade and the paper money interest Faust little, but the vision of the fairest woman in the world touches his emotional nature anew, although in a very different way from that in which Gretchen had attracted him. Faust has risen on his dead life to higher things; Helen is not merely a woman who kindles in him love, but an embodiment of that ideal beauty which gives his life its higher inspiration. Mephistopheles still hopes in his blind, unseeing way that Helen may succeed where Gretchen failed, and satisfy the craving and striving whereby Faust still eludes him; and when Faust demands the real Helen, in place of the shadow he had conjured up to amuse the Emperor, he, powerless himself to bring Helen back, points out to Faust the way that leads to the mysterious "mothers," those guardians of the eternal ideals, from whom he will receive the key that opens up the way through the centuries.

Meanwhile Mephistopheles, dissatisfied in finding that Faust's erotic feelings have been raised, as it were, to a higher, more spiritual plane, endeavours to distract him from his vision of Greek beauty by means drawn from that medieval world in which he is more at home. But even here Mephistopheles cannot evade his fate, foreshadowed by God in the prologue, that all his efforts to work evil only result ultimately in good. The “ Homunculus,” a tiny being, which is produced in a retort, like a chemical product, by Faust's famulus Wagner, only helps Faust to attain his object; for it is the Homunculus who, in one of the most grotesquely imagined scenes in the whole range of dramatic literature, leads Faust to that vision of antique beauty, the “ classical Walpurgisnacht.” At last Faust gains his heart's desire; he finds his way back to classic antiquity, to the real Helen of Troy. The third act, which was published long before the completed Second Part, is a masterpiece of Goethe's classic art; it is pervaded by that Hellenism which it was the aim of Weimar classicism to bring back, like Helen herself, from the antique world into the romantic medievalism of the northern world. In fact, the Helena is an allegory of the classic-romantic movement of the time, and the wonderfully picturesque scene where Helen and her Greek women, shrinking before the barbaric splendour of the German middle ages, are received by Faust in his turreted castle, is an allegory of the classic Goethe's mission in poetry.

Obviously the restless, striving Faust cannot remain here; were Helen to have satisfied him, the hour of Mephistopheles's triumph would have come. Beauty is no end in itself, and it is Helen's rôle not to satisfy him, but to lead him onwards to a wide activity in the service of humanity. Through his love for Helen, Faust passes through that "æsthetic education" which Schiller had praised as the portal to the higher life; it was the most precious lesson which the classic literature of Germany had to teach, the education and liberation of humanity by means of the beautiful.

And in Act IV., where the allegory is most concentrated, and, it must be added, least successful, Faust is won back to a life of action, passes from the quest of an æsthetic ideal to practical life as a man among men. To Mephistopheles he appears a greater riddle than ever; it passes beyond the devil's comprehension how any mortal, provided, as Faust had been, with all that is desirable in life, should turn his back on it and plunge into a new activity that means labour, hardship, and doubtful success. Again Faust places his services at the disposal of his Emperor, this time not to relieve financial necessity or while away an idle hour, but for the grim business of war ; and in return, the Emperor grants him a strip of land by the sea. Goethe, with that fantastic love of allegory which is the last infirmity of noble poetic minds, makes his Faust create the very land over which he is to rule ; he founds a new state on a strip of coast-land which he has regained from the sea.. In Act V. Faust's dream is realised ; his unceasing activity is crowned with complete success ; he rules over a free people living on a land of their own creating. At this point Goethe, as if to show that there are limits to human perfectibility, introduces an episode in which Faust ruthlessly dispossesses an old couple of their home ; the poet would apparently imply that Faust's arrogant dreams and unlimited power have stifled in him sympathy, that “ reverence for what is beneath us ” which in Goethe's spiritual thought was an essential element in the highest reverence, the reverence for oneself. Faust's end draws near ; he has reached the great age of a hundred, and Mephistopheles knows that that final struggle for his soul cannot long be delayed. From the smoking ashes of the home which he has destroyed, emerge, like Eumenides, four grey women, Want and Guilt, Care and Need. Of these, only Care can have any hold on Faust ; his wealth and might render the others powerless. Care alone can steal through the keyhole of Faust's palace, and she breathes upon his eyes and makes him blind. But physical blindness gives Faust clearer spiritual vision, more steadfast resolution to complete the great work of his life. As Mephistopheles summons his ghostly grave-diggers to dig his grave, the sound of their shovels seems to him but the music of the creative labour he himself commands. Thus active, striving to the last, Faust achieves his life-work :

Yes, to this thought I firmly cling,
 Wisdom's last fruit profoundly true :
 Freedom alone he earns as well as life,
 Who day by day must conquer them anew.
 So here, by dangers girt, youth, manhood, age,
 Shall live a vigorous life from year to year ;
 And such a throng I fain would see
 Stand on free soil among a people free.
 Then to the moment I might say :
 Linger a while, thou art so fair !
 The traces of my earthly life
 Cannot in æons pass away.—

It is in the conquering of one's life anew with every day, not in the mere heaping up of material wealth and the acquisition of power, things that are only too apt to obscure the spiritual goal, in which man's final victory lies. Even Faust's worldly position may be understood as part of the great allegory ; for Faust stands for that pedagogic ideal which was so deeply engrained in Goethe's time ; he realises the dream of the greater rationalists of the eighteenth century in Germany from Lessing to Goethe, the “ perfection in humanity ” of the race.

Faust sinks down, his life has come to its appointed end. Mephistopheles triumphs ; he summons his devils to his aid, but these are beaten back by the angels who scatter roses, a scene that had a peculiar fascination for Ruskin’s imagination. It is the spirit, not the letter of the law that counts. The angels bear upwards the immortal part of Faust, singing as they go :

Gerettet ist das edle Glied
Der Geisterwelt vom Bösen :
Wer immer strebend sich bemüht,
Den können wir erlösen.

“ He who strives in never-wearying activity can be redeemed by us,” words which might be regarded as the key to Faust’s life-problem. The drama closes as it had begun, as a medieval mystery ; amidst the wondrous imaginings of medieval theology, Faust is led upward and onward, by the woman-soul, now embodied in the earthly semblance of Gretchen, to the feet of the Virgin.

There is one problem connected with this closing symphony which in recent years has occupied Goethe critics much, namely, the very apt question as to whether Mephistopheles has not morally won his wager, whether he has not been unjustly cheated out of his booty by God. Faust has uttered the magic words which were to deliver him over to the devil ; he has reached the stage when he has ceased to strive ; and Goethe has not made it clear why the powers of good should, as is clearly the case, triumph in the end. Goethe himself anticipated this difficulty ; in a conversation with Eckermann in 1831 he referred to the lines we have just quoted together with their continuation :

Und hat an ihm die Liebe gar
 Von oben Teil genommen,
 Begegnet ihm die selige Schar
 Mit herzlichem Willkommen.

“ And if love has gone out to him from above, the blessed host will meet him with affectionate welcome.”

“ In those lines,” said Goethe, “ is contained the key to Faust’s salvation : in Faust himself an ever higher and purer activity to the end, and the eternal Love coming to his aid from above. This is in complete harmony with our religious idea, according to which we are not saved by our own power, but by the Divine Mercy acting with it.” This explanation does not, however, get rid of the difficulty ; the fact remains that, according to his last words, Faust has discovered a condition under which he is able to “ bid the passing moment stay,” namely, in the success of his altruistic energy. According to the strict letter of the law, Mephistopheles does triumph. It has been suggested that a new factor has made itself felt in the situation in so far as it is not really Mephistopheles who triumphs, but Time. “ Time,” says Mephistopheles, “ is the master of him who has so powerfully withstood me.” But the admission is none the less there; and therefore Faust’s soul—over which Time has no control—ought to fall to the powers of evil. But here the optimist in Goethe interposed: Faust is saved by the Divine Mercy. It is the final conclusion of an optimism on which, as Goethe says, rest the “ foundations of our religion,” or, as one might say, the foundations of human faith in the Unseen and Incomprehensible.

CHAPTER VIII

GOETHE'S PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

IN no phase of Goethe's activity does he stand out more clearly as a poet than in his relations to abstract thinking. Living in the most "philosophic" age of the world's history, Goethe was himself no philosopher; and he constantly and emphatically deprecated any attempt to regard him as such. This does not mean that he took no interest in such matters; on the contrary, he was as keenly alive as any of his contemporaries to the movement of ideas; but he held himself aloof, he remained the onlooker. Or we might put it another way, and say that Goethe was a philosopher who expressed adherence to no system of philosophy; he was an eclectic in the sense in which that word was used at a later stage in the history of philosophy. He culled a little here and there, his selection being guided solely by his personal needs; but he had no faith in the elaborate efforts of metaphysicians to solve the ultimate problems of the universe. He was a sceptic who took his stand on what he himself regarded as common sense. It was enough for him to know what the problems were;

he regarded them as unapproachable mysteries. He was convinced that there could be no finality in human thought ; behind the last mountain ranges he saw ever higher chains. For such a concrete, unmetaphysical mind, the liberating tendencies in Kant's thought, which superseded the utilitarian rationalism of the previous age, were, no doubt, welcome ; and Goethe especially appreciated Kant's definition of the scope of the human intelligence ; but he could have little sympathy for the universal dogmatism of Hegelianism. In approaching every phase of human thought or activity, Goethe first set himself to distinguish between the knowable and the unknowable, the attainable and the unattainable. He recognised cheerfully the limitations of the human mind and declined to dogmatise about what he ruled as lying beyond human ken. " Man is not born to solve the problems of the world, but rather to discover where the problems lie, and then to keep within the limits of the comprehensible."

Goethe's own intellectual temperament naturally conditioned in the main his attitude to metaphysics : but something must also be attributed to the fact that in the most impressionable period of his life he fell under the spell of Spinoza. He had been bathed, so to speak, invulnerable in the pantheism of Spinozism. For, if we may judge by Goethe's case, it is the peculiarity of Spinoza's philosophy that it does not make a man a Spinozist, as Hegel converted his adherents into Hegelians; it rather acts as a kind of vaccine, which renders its followers immune against metaphysic dogmatism. Such, at least, was its effect on Goethe. For him Spinozism was something similar to what the Roman Catholic Church was to the early Romanticists: a source of satisfying belief that precluded the need of reopening metaphysical problems. Goethe might thus be described as a Spinozist who was indifferent to the dogmas of Spinoza; he accepted the oneness of God with nature, but resolutely declined to question farther. This type of mind, uninquiring where the suprasensual was concerned, is by no means to be regarded as an unqualified advantage; it no doubt made Goethe a less deep and less conclusive thinker in abstract things than Schiller; it robbed his speculations in natural science of qualities which would have greatly enhanced their value. But in all that pertained to Goethe the artist, it was only in his favour.

Although Goethe thus took no active part in the evolution of metaphysical thinking in Germany between Kant and Hegel, he had much to say of the highest value in the field of ethical philosophy. Here, indeed, the poet's repugnance to vague speculation, his antipathy to dogmatic systems and would-be finality, stood him in excellent stead. He became the spokesman of an ethical philosophy which, in saneness and healthy common sense, excelled, as it has outlived, the ethic systems of the philosophers of his day. For Goethe succeeded in avoiding the shallow materialism of Rationalism as well as the ecstatic unbalance of the Romanticism that superseded it; he set up a golden mean in which the very best practical thinking of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries is concentrated. Here Goethe still speaks to us with a living voice. When we consider Goethe as a philosopher, we thus think, not of his metaphysics, but of his ethics. None of the great poets of the world has expressed so clearly and definitely his conception of the duty of man, as Goethe has throughout the length and breadth of his works.

Perhaps the most concentrated expression of Goethe's moral philosophy is to be found—veiled, it is true, in an obscuring Leibnizian phraseology—in his aphorism Das Höchste: “The highest we have received from God is life, the rotating movement of the monad round itself, which knows no rest; the impulse to maintain and cherish life is inborn and indestructible in each of us; its peculiar nature remains, however, a secret from ourselves and others. The second favour we have received from above is experience, perception, the power of the living monad to act on its surroundings in the outside world, whereby it becomes conscious of its inward unlimitedness, and its outward limitations. . . . A third favour is the development of that activity which we direct against the outside world in the form of action, word and writing." The first duty of man, as Goethe conceived it, is to recognise frankly his limitations; to delimitate his sphere, to realise what the demands are that life makes on him. The highest practical wisdom to which Faust attains is :

Earth's narrow sphere is known enough to me.
The view beyond is barred from mortal sight :
Fool ! who would yonder turn his blinking eyes
And dream to find his like above the clouds !
Firm let him stand and look around him here ;
To men of worth this world is never mute.

Everyone has his appointed task to do in the world, and it is his first business to make himself clear as to what that task is. This clearness attained, it becomes his duty to act. Action is the final solution to all problems of the practical life : for " in every situation of life a definite activity is demanded of us."

When, however, we come to ask : What is the nature of this task which is imposed upon us ? how are we to recognise our peculiar duty when it presents itself to us ? Goethe is a less sure guide. It is not merely that here the great exception has a difficulty in prescribing for the ruck of mankind, but also that there was a certain duality in Goethe's ethical philosophy, two opposing and contradicting principles, which he never quite succeeded in reconciling. The first of these is his insistence that every man must develop to the full his own character and individuality. This, one might say, was the alpha and omega of Goethe's faith in his days of "Storm and Stress"; and he repeated it again and again in varying forms in later life. There was, indeed, no conviction to which he remained more constant all his life than that the highest aim of every human life should be to develop itself to its utmost capacity. But Goethe's views underwent a change with respect to what constituted this development. The ruthlessness of his early thought soon gave place to a more temperate and deliberate conception of moral development, which in later years made it increasingly difficult for him to maintain his old individualism. In his last and ripest period his conception of the highest form of human activity and development of human personality had nothing in it of base self-aggrandisement, or of ruthless egotism; it was an activity and a development in harmony with the interests of the social body. In Goethe's ethical philosophy, all personal desires must be restrained and subordinated to higher ends: self-sacrifice for an unselfish ideal is all-essential to the right development of character. An element in all true education is "Entsagung" or renunciation, which word assuredly did not mean self-torturing to Goethe; he did not confuse it, as Carlyle did, with the "Entbéhren sollst du, sollst entbehren!" of Faust, or the "bitter tears" of Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahr. That was quite another matter. The "Entsagung" of the Wanderjahre means only the rational ordering of one's life, the foresight which is inherent in all true education. We must "renounce" certain things, not do them or enjoy them, in no spirit of disappointment, but cheerfully, in order that we may the more surely attain our end at a later time. To "renounce" meant to Goethe merely to subordinate individual desires and actions to the interests of the whole. "Entsagung" is, as we have ultimately to realise, for our good. It is just this resignation of the passing happiness that makes us free, a thought in which one seems to catch an echo of the Kantian ethics. The victory over self, "Selbstüberwindung," is a great positive idea, no ascetic denial of happiness:

Von der Gewalt, die alle Wesen bindet,
Befreit der Mensch sich, der sich überwindet.

Goethe, then, in his outlook on the individual life, is far from being a pessimist; and it is not surprising that he has been hailed by the most advanced movement of ethic philosophy on the continent as a pioneer of that "Lebensbejahung" with which Nietzsche confronted the solid phalanx of nineteenth-century pessimism since Schopenhauer. But at no stage could Goethe's optimism be described as militant or aggressive; it, too, had "overcome itself"; had been schooled, as Nietzsche's in our own time, in pessimism or, at least, in the eighteenth-century equivalent of pessimism. Indeed, so firmly was Goethe convinced of the harmony and rightness of God's world, that he accepted calmly all that life brought with it in a spirit not far removed from fatalism. In later years the little word "abwarten" played a great part in the poet's contemplation of life. He was a fatalist, but, paradoxical as it may seem, an optimistic fatalist:

Nach ewigen ehrenen
Grossen Gesetzen,
Müssen wir alle
Unseres Daseins Kreise vollenden.

The development of personality must, it was clear, proceed on moral lines, that is to say, be guided by certain eternal principles of right and wrong. Goethe has no answer to give us when we ask what these principles are, and how do we arrive at them; it was not his way, as we have seen, to try to pierce behind the veil; he leaves the ideas of right and wrong unjustified, regards them as something implanted in our conscience and not to be questioned. It is, however, obvious that the right and wrong of human action is a social conception, the result of an evolution of social ideals; and from whatever point of view we look at the problem, it introduces an altruistic element into individual morality.

✓ Altruism was a conspicuous feature of Goethe's ethics, as it was of every eighteenth-century philosophy; and it stands in constant, if not always conscious, conflict with the principle of individualism from which Goethe set out. He insisted, and with ever-increasing emphasis as life went on, that the highest activity of man must necessarily be altruistic in character. This is embodied in the close of Faust; Faust discovers that his ultimate mission lies in working for his fellow-men. The fact remains, however, that Goethe never fairly faced the conflict between the two principles; in his optimistic way he believed that, somehow or other, the individualist and the altruist would discover a modus vivendi without serious sacrifice on either side. The reconciliation of these ideas was one of the problems Goethe put aside as insoluble; but this did not lessen the validity of his practical philosophy. No thinker or poet of modern times has expressed a higher wisdom on the conduct of the individual life than Goethe has done; none has interpreted, with a nearer approach to finality, that law of conduct which Matthew Arnold used to tell us was three-fourths of life: to take life seriously; to do the duty that lies nearest to us; to act, not dream, or speculate or talk; to seek salvation in constant striving and fighting. "Ein Mensch sein heisst ein Kämpfer sein." "Wer immer strebend sich bemüht, den können wir erlösen." In aphorisms like these, Goethe has concentrated a philosophy of conduct which is as convincing to-day as it was in Goethe's own age.

Goethe's social philosophy has not, it must be confessed, the same firm, assured outlines and the same present-day value, as his personal philosophy; but when we remember the age in which Goethe lived, this is hardly surprising. His life extended over what, in social development, was the most momentous era in modern Europe, the era of the French Revolution. The Revolution had much to do with Goethe's change of front; and the Revolution was followed by the rise of Napoleon, which again gave Goethe much to think of concerning the relations of the individual to the social body. Before these events Goethe had had no occasion to revise or even seriously consider the views on social questions which he had accepted, as a matter of course, throughout the years of his political activity as Minister of State of the Duchy of Weimar. In fact, before the French Revolution, political thinking in the modern sense of the word had not seriously busied Goethe, or, for that part, the entire German people, at all. Under the ancien régime the existing political institutions were accepted as a time-honoured and firmly-established arrangement of Providence in a well-ordered world.

Thus in Weimar Goethe seconded the fatherly absolutism of his Duke. As for practical politics, he brushed them aside with the dogma that every man must "sweep before his own door," that he must be active to the best of his ability in the circle of life in which he happened to be placed. He never definitely formulated his pre-Revolutionary views on these matters, but had he done so, he would probably have said that the state was a means to an end, that end being to obtain free play for the development of its individual members. He would, no doubt, have recognised that the state often ran counter to such ideals; but it was the object of the "enlightened" state, such as he helped to realise in Weimar, to interfere as little as possible with the individual, and to make the minimum claim on him. A natural corollary to such a view of the state was that, political responsibilities being reduced to a minimum, patriotism was an unnecessary and superfluous sentiment, a view which was entirely in accordance with the cosmopolitanism of the German people in the later eighteenth century.

But first the Revolution, then Napoleon, shattered this political indifferentism. The Revolution demonstrated the futility of the eighteenth-century State to fulfil its function in anything but fair weather ; Napoleon's career showed how the colourless ideal of Weimar might at any moment be at the mercy of the individual aggressor. The common conclusion to be drawn from both phenomena was that the staying power of the State would have to be increased, if it were to resist and counteract such disintegrating forces. It is interesting to watch, as a commentary on Goethe's political thought, the reflection in his mind of the events in France. Like all the great Germans of his time, Goethe greeted the Revolution with enthusiasm, only to turn from it, as it progressed, with dismay and abhorrence ; what at first promised to be an emancipation of society from intolerable fetters, ultimately appeared to him as a triumph of brutality and darkness over the humane enlightenment which the eighteenth century regarded as its most precious achievement ; and this attitude remained tolerably constant. It lies, for instance, behind the somewhat trivial comedy Der Bürgergeneral, written in 1793 ; it throws a reflected light on Hermann und Dorothea in 1798, and it inspired Die natürliche Tochter in 1804. His standpoint towards Napoleon passed through more varied phases. In the beginning of his meteoric career Napoleon awakened Goethe's admiration, and even enthusiasm ; but as his power grew and spread, a certain distrust found its way into Goethe's mind, and a veritable antipathy to this man, who played fast and loose with the rights of the individual, and endangered, by his mere caprice, the validity and power of states. Later, when Napoleon's dreams had become a reality and the continent lay at his feet, Goethe's fatalism began to assert itself anew : he wondered if the success of this great, strong man had not something God-appointed in it, and his personal contact with him in the famous interview of Erfurt, when Napoleon flattered the " author of Werther " with the words " Vous êtes un homme ! " deepened his personal respect for him. So convinced did he become of Napoleon's " mission " in Europe, that he viewed with scepticism the efforts of German patriots to throw off the yoke of the oppressor. Even after the disastrous Russian campaign, Goethe maintained his faith in Napoleon. " Rattle at your chains," he said to the young poets of the War of Liberation, " the man is too great for you, you cannot break them ! " And in his own mind he justified Napoleon in Germany as a champion of culture and enlightenment, of that inner freedom which he prized above independence and patriotism, as a bulwark against the possible invasion and subjugation of Germany by the Slavs. But again Goethe had to change his opinion; and he did it frankly and openly. Des Epimenides Erwachen (1814) echoes the patriotic jubilation that followed the victory of Leipzig.

The change which came over Goethe's ideas of the relation of the individual to the State in the epoch that succeeded the Revolution meant naturally a complete break with the old political régime. The social conditions of Europe had been changed by the Revolution and by the natural evolution of human thought and activity in the early nineteenth century; and Goethe had to become reconciled to the new conditions. This, we might say, he did, or tried to do, in Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre. We have already seen how, on its artistic side, that book was a profound disappointment to those who had hoped for a real continuation of the Lehrjahre; it is an even greater disappointment as an exposition of social philosophy. Nothing, indeed, could show more clearly how difficult it was for Goethe, a denizen of the eighteenth century, to arrive at clear ideas about the new social and political developments of the nineteenth. In the Wanderjahre he has honestly tried to adopt a new standpoint; he frankly realised that the rise of industrialism, and the development of machinery, had created entirely new conditions ; that the increased potency of human activity, and the correspondingly rapid accumulation of wealth, demanded a revised theory of the body social and politic. But he finds the new era overwhelming in its complexity, and in face of that complexity he virtually fell back—just as in metaphysics he had given himself over to Spinoza—on the old “contrat social” of Rousseau. Thus Goethe, the most individualistic of poets, becomes in his old age an exponent of uncompromising socialism. The State is no longer to exist to foster the individual ; individuals only exist to constitute the State.

But one must at least give Goethe credit for a certain reluctance in enunciating these views ; he regarded this State socialism as a kind of pis aller ; it was not so much his own personal ideal as what seemed to him the goal towards which the world was moving. In other words, Goethe was nonplussed ; he could not understand the development of the world, and he let his old individualistic faith go. He was no more able to discover the germs of a new individualism in the Romantic thought of the early nineteenth century than he was able to foresee the great poetic forces that were ultimately to rise from the ashes of pessimism.

It was but natural that the unwillingness which Goethe showed to tie himself down to dogmatic systems in philosophy should have manifested itself in his religious thought. One remembers the elusiveness of Faust's confession about his religion to Gretchen, a passage which dates from Goethe's days of "Sturm und Drang"; and all his life long Goethe was equally unwilling to formulate his own religious beliefs. Religion, the relation of the soul to God, was to him—imbued as he had been in early life with the spiritual shyness of pietism—a Holy of Holies into which he refused to allow the outsider to pry. To Goethe, the Spinozist, religion was an all-pervading thing that imbued man's whole life and activity; and it was as possible for it to manifest itself in art and literature as in the special attitude of the mind to faith and doctrine.

Wer Wissenschaft und Kunst besitzt,
 Hat auch Religion;
 Wer jene beiden nicht besitzt,
 Der habe Religion.

("He who possesses learning and art, has also religion;
 let him who has not these things have religion.")

He told Jacobi once that as a poet and an artist he was a polytheist, as a scientist a pantheist, the one as decidedly as the other. "If I require a god for my personality as a moral being, one has also been provided."

The pulse of Goethe's religious sentiment is obviously not to be sought in any adherence to sectarian dogmas, but rather in that attitude of mind which we have already found manifested in his metaphysic and moral theorising, namely, the frank recognition of man's limitations and the equally frank recognition of the existence of mysteries and problems beyond our ken. What to him made the religious nature was just this sense of limitation, this belief in powers, working for our good, which transcend our intelligence. Perhaps the nearest approach to an enunciation of Goethe's religious faith is to be found in those wonderful pages of the Wanderjahre, which explain the doctrine of the Three Reverences :

“ Three kinds of gestures you have seen : and we inculcate a threefold reverence, which, when commingled and formed into one whole, attains its highest force and effect. The first is, reverence for what is above us. . . . Then comes the second, reverence for what is under us. . . . But from this we delay not to free our pupil the instant we become convinced that the instruction connected with it has produced sufficient influence on him. Then, on the contrary, we bid him gather courage, and, turning to his comrades, range himself along with them. Now, at last, he stands forth, frank and bold, not selfishly isolated : only in combination with his equals does he front the world. Further we have nothing to add. . . . The religion which depends on reverence for what is above us we denominate the ethnic ; it is the religion of the nations and the first happy deliverance from a degrading fear : all heathen religions, as we call them, are of this sort, whatsoever names they may bear. The second religion, which founds itself on reverence for what is around us, we denominate the philosophical ; for the philosopher stations himself in the middle, and must draw down to him all that is higher, and up to him all that is lower : and only in this medium condition does he merit the title of Wise. . . . The third religion, grounded on reverence for what is beneath us, we name the Christian, as in the Christian such a temper is with most distinctness manifested : it is a last step to which mankind were fitted and destined to attain."

"To which of these religions do you specially adhere ? " inquired Wilhelm.

"To all the three," replied they ; "for in their union they produce what may properly be called the true religion. Out of those three reverences springs the highest reverence—reverence for one's self ; and those again unfold themselves from this : so that man attains the highest elevation of which he is capable, that of being justified in reckoning himself the best that God and Nature have produced—nay, of being able to continue on this lofty eminence, without being again, by self-conceit and presumption, drawn down from it into the vulgar level."

Such a doctrine, cabalistically expressed as it is here, is the last link in the development of eighteenth-century religious enlightenment. The narrow-sighted deism of the early time, combined with the materialistic sacrifice of faith to morality, which was inherent in the Rationalism of the middle of the eighteenth century, widened and deepened in Goethe's mind to a spiritual conception of the universe as God's and a reverence for the created world, suffused by an unswerving optimism.

Goethe's nature was, no doubt, an intensely religious one, not in any doctrinaire, or even Christian sense. But his belief in the right governance of the universe was unassailable ; his reliance and faith in God was the corner-stone of his optimism ; it, too, was the basis for that intense personal fatalism which, as we have seen, coloured all his activity ; and it inspired his Olympic tranquillity of outlook in later years. Religious, too, was that reverence with which he regarded the gift so generously bestowed on himself, the gift of genius. The unconscious, mysterious thing called inspiration was to him a veritable gift of God ; and his favourite word for describing it—whether in himself or in a Napoleon—"dæmonic," was a tacit acknowledgment of the guiding hand of a Higher Power. "Every productivity of the highest kind, every significant aperçu, every invention, every great thought, which bears fruit and leads to other thoughts, stands outside our control and is raised high above all earthly powers. Man has to regard such things as unhoped-for gifts from above. . . . In such cases, he is often to be looked upon as the tool of the higher world-government, as a vessel that has been found worthy for the reception of a divine influence."

CHAPTER IX

GOETHE AS A SCIENTIST AND CRITIC

GOETHE, one might say, was the last of those poly-historic, Aristotelian geniuses who have been able to span with equal, unflagging enthusiasm all fields of human activity. No man whose main business in life was poetry, has ever manifested so whole-hearted an interest in natural science, in art, and in politics as Goethe. There is, however, on the part of his critics an excusable tendency to regard Goethe with leniency in respect of these multiform interests ; to take seriously what in lesser mortals would be summarily dismissed as the merest dilet-tantism. Goethe's self-judgment was, no doubt, not always correct : he had—unfortunately, when we remember the claims it made on his time—an unreasonably high opinion of his talents in the fine arts ; and he had also a higher opinion of his importance as a man of science than was justified by his achievements. And it is just in this field that he has been treated with what appears to be excessive indulgence.

There can be no question of the seriousness of Goethe's interest in the natural sciences ; they formed the solid foundation for all his speculation, and his occupation with them was throughout his life more persistent than was that with poetry. Goethe's method of approaching such sciences as biology, optics and geology seems, however, strangely in antagonism with his methods in other fields. Goethe's intellectual life was governed, as we have just seen, by a healthy principle of a posteriori reasoning; he progressed from fact to theory, a point that is nowhere more clearly brought out than in his correspondence and relations with Schiller, whose intellectual methods were purely a priori. But Goethe did not enter upon his most important scientific work in this spirit, not as the humble, unbiassed investigator, but as the theorist who wished to see his theories substantiated. He may himself have believed that he was subordinating the hypothesis to the fact, using it merely as a scaffolding, and he has, no doubt, many wise things to say about observation and experiment being the only true bases of science; but the spirit of the time was too strong for him; and in the incubating period of modern science the hypothesis played, and rightly played, a great rôle. Goethe thus really approached science as the intuitive philosopher, and as the poet.

In biology, where his work has most significance, he was led to the problems by that holy reverence for Nature, which had been instilled in him in early days by Rousseau and Rousseau's German apostles: he was inspired by the great idea of spiritual evolution, which, first dimly outlined by Vico, was expressed with suggestive force by Herder; and he applied the ideas of Herder, who was anything but a scientist, to the world of Nature, which Rousseau had taught him to love. This Nature was no mere collection of blind happenings, but one and indivisible, a manifestation of God, His "living garment," an organically developing phenomenon. Goethe sought continuity everywhere; and in his quest of continuity he lighted on two widely significant discoveries—both really arrived at by a priori methods—the existence of a rudimentary intermaxillary bone in man, and what he called the "metamorphosis of plants," that is to say, the theory according to which the organs of a plant are all modifications of the leaf.

The success of these investigations was a little unfortunate, for it led Goethe to view his achievements with excessive self-confidence. He had made these discoveries alone and unaided; he was proud of them, and this pride engendered an overbearing sense of superiority to the other scientific workers of his time. Consequently he came into no kind of touch with these, but only with philosophical scientists, like his friends in Jena, who were influenced by the metaphysical theories of Fichte and Schelling. This was naturally calculated to increase rather than counteract the a priori method with which he had set out. Had Goethe, in these years when he was most exclusively interested in science, worked in hearty co-operation with the French and English representatives of empiric scientific thinking and investigation, it would have prevented him falling into the errors of his geological theories and his almost childish unwillingness to let the abstruseness of mathematics—one science to which his poly-historic interest did not extend—come between him and the phenomena of light and colour.

As a scientific writer Goethe made his debut in 1784 with his paper on the intermaxillary bone; and in 1790 appeared his book on the Metamorphosis of Plants. The investigations which resulted in the latter treatise were undertaken in the first instance as a protest against the artificialities of the Linnean system. Linné had reduced the plant-world to a mosaic wanting in any organic ground-plan or binding-principles. Goethe, starting from his preconceived view of Nature as a harmonious whole, endeavoured to establish unity in the vegetable world; he conceived a kind of ideal "Urpflanze," from which theoretically all plants could be deduced. Branch, calyx, petal, stamen, fruit, were so many different modifications of the simple leaf. This theory was doubtless an enormous step forward in the direction of evolutionary biology ; and it was but a transference of it to the animal world when he applied a similar line of reasoning to the skeleton of mammals in his Entwurf einer Einleitung in die vergleichende Anatomie (1795). In place of the typical, symbolical plant, Goethe here saw the animal centred in the vertebral column, which throws out appendages, just as the stem throws out leaves ; and, as at its highest point the stem bears flower and fruit, so the six uppermost vertebræ develop to form the crowning organ of the animal, its head.

It is not to be denied that in these morphological studies Goethe had at least a glimpse of that theory of organic evolution which Darwin was to establish a generation and more later. An aphorism like the following clearly foreshadows Darwinism : “ Nature can attain to anything she sets out to achieve only by means of a gradual succession. She makes no leaps. She could not, for example, make a horse, if it had not been preceded by all the other animals, as a kind of ladder by which she ascended to the structure of the horse.” Or again : “ Nature, in order to arrive at man, institutes a long prelude of beings and forms which are, it is true, deficient in a great deal that is essential to man. But in each is visible a tendency which points to the next form above it.” There is, however, a very material distinction between the reasoning that expresses itself in such a form and Darwinism. Goethe and Darwin approached the same problem from opposite sides. Goethe's conception of evolution was not based, like that of the English pioneers of the theory, on a synthesis of scientific investigations, but was rather a deduction from a theory. It was a mere corollary to his conception of the universe as a harmonious whole. The ideas went back through Herder to the old Leibnizian "Theodicée," which put its stamp on the whole eighteenth century. Nature was not and could not be an enemy of man, "red in tooth and claw," as she appeared to an analytic, scientific age, but rather a great harmonious entity, into which it was man's highest privilege and happiness to fit himself.

Thus although modern biology has arrived at conclusions towards which Goethe's speculations pointed, and although the modern scientist feels in sympathy with him and may even, like Haeckel, look to him as a pioneer of the theory of organic evolution, the fact remains that Goethe was not, and could not have been, a scientist of the modern type; he arrived at his results by mental processes which modern science has discarded. He built up his ideas on a pantheistic philosophy and a fatalistic belief in the goodness of the universe; he saw in evolution the expression in Nature, of the gradually unfolding mind of God, working in the "loom of time"; whatever Goethe was, he was not, as he is often represented to be, a purely deductive thinker, with no thought for anything but the record of observation and experiment, no belief that went beyond the concrete.

The best proof that Goethe did not mean by evolution what Darwin meant, is to be seen in his blindness to the ultimate significance of the evolutionary theory for the natural sciences. Science in Goethe's day had, in fact, not yet progressed far enough on empiric lines to be able to avail itself of such a theory. The chief obstacle in his way lay in the fact that he was, as we have seen in the preceding chapter, limited by strict boundaries of the knowable and unknowable; the principle of arbitrary limitation, however healthy in the regulating of human conduct, is a serious bar to the furthering of science; here the mind which dogmatizes as to which problems are soluble and which are not, is lost. Thus, just as Goethe had little patience with psychological investigation, and only approved in a half-hearted way, or not at all, the preoccupation of his contemporaries with metaphysics, so he was prevented by his preconceived conclusions from giving his theory of organic development the wider application of which it was capable. There was clearly no room for an Origin of Species in an investigator who could say : “ When the earth had arrived at a certain point of maturity . . . mankind arose everywhere where the soil permitted of it . . . to reflect on this, as has been done, I hold to be a useless occupation which we may leave to those who are fond of busying themselves with insoluble problems.”

With Goethe's other scientific writings we need not take up much space ; the zeal with which he prosecuted the study of geology is born witness to by the fact that it overflowed into the Second Part of Faust. The geological world of those days was divided into two opposing camps, Vulcanists, who maintained that the earth's crust was the product of igneous action, and Neptunists, who maintained the aqueous origin of the globe. Goethe belonged to the latter class, and again, on purely a priori grounds ; his adherence to this theory did not imply that he had reviewed and weighed the evidence, but merely that he could believe in no Nature who proceeded with her work spasmodically or violently. Vulcanism implied cataclysms, and cataclysms were contrary to the smooth and harmonious working of the universe. That was all. Goethe's investigations into the science of optics, and more particularly the theory of colour, bulk largely among his scientific works. His history of the theory of colour is admirably written, and in the patient investigation and experimentation with colour, Goethe has approached more nearly than in his biological work to what we should nowadays regard as the proper attitude and method of the man of science towards his facts. But unfortunately his work in this province is marred by a quite unreasonable and unscientific antagonism to the Newtonian theory of light. Not that Goethe is necessarily wrong—among his defenders was a no less distinguished thinker than Schopenhauer—and Newton necessarily right ; but before anyone has a right to proclaim an opponent wrong, he must follow him into all the intricacies of his proof. This Goethe did not, and—owing to his small mathematics—could not do ; and so virtually on the basis of his own inaptitude for that science, he pronounced the mathematical investigation of the theory of light wrong.

In his critical appreciation of literature and art, Goethe was tinged with the universalism and cosmopolitanism of his epoch. In his youth, in those militant criticisms of the Frankfurter gelehrte Anzeigen and elsewhere, he defended the ideas of the “ Sturm und Drang ” as formulated by men like Herder and Gerstenberg : the contempt for the rules, the rights of genius, and revolt against authority. In later life he turned with understanding to the products of a classic and even a pseudo-classic art. The Goethe who in his youth had overflowed in boundless enthusiasm for Shakespeare, translated in middle life the Mahomet and Tancrède of Voltaire for the Weimar stage, and pruned and purified, in approved Gallic fashion, the Romeo and Juliet of Shakespeare. But Goethe's later developments never entirely obscured his earlier judgments; the old principles remained even where a personal antipathy was involved. Thus we find him in later years speaking with admirable clearness and fairness of the writings of the Romantic School, and that at a time when he had but little sympathy for that school's tendencies. The few cases where Goethe's judgment played him false—in the case of Kleist, for example—are so exceptional that they only bring home to us anew how reliable his opinion in literature was. One antipathy, however, he brought with him from earlier years, an antipathy he could never overcome, namely, to the Middle Ages. The Middle Ages meant nothing to him personally; at most he could speak with a certain understanding and national pride, if without enthusiasm, of the Nibelungenlied; but the intellectual darkness, the lack of any sense of style, above all, the grotesque and tyrannous forms of medieval religious thought, were abhorrent to him; and in his eyes Dante, the one great "world-poet" whose poetry could make no personal appeal to him, was still a medieval poet.

To one literature only did his allegiance never waver, the literature of Greece. Here he was the true heir of the century of humanitarianism. In Greece he found the fullest and most serene expression of the "Allgemeinmenschliche" to which it is the highest problem of art and poetry to give visible form. Shakespeare came and went in his affections, but in his allegiance to Homer he remained constant all his life long, from those early days of Werthers Leiden, when the pictures of Homer's world, as the ideal of spiritual health, were obscured, as his hero loses his mental tranquillity and balance, by the romantic mists of Ossian. Homer was his ideal in his classical period; and the next place in his affections belonged to the Greek tragic poets, above all, to Sophocles. Goethe was in the fullest sense of that often abused term a Hellenist; but his Hellenism never came into conflict with anti-Hellenism, at least not as it did in Heine's case. The antique world remained for him the most human and humane expression of man's aspirations; time and again he insisted on the need of all true culture being based on that of Greece, and on the ancient tongues being the indispensable basis of all true education.

But, on the whole, there is comparatively little literary criticism in Goethe's works; he has written less, in a systematic way, about literature or its history than any other of the greater German poets. On the other hand, many volumes of his works are filled with his opinions on art. But here his views were distinctly narrower, partly because he had gone through no phases in art corresponding to the "Sturm und Drang" unrest in literature; the enthusiasm for Gothic architecture in Strassburg, which in later life he repudiated, was never really incompatible with his classic tastes. Consequently the classicism of Winkelmann passed on in Goethe's mind unbroken into the classicism which he maintained in his own book on Winkelmann, in his Propyläen and in Über Kunst und Altertum. Goethe was a far less tolerant Hellenist in art than in literature. The plastic masterpieces of Greece, especially the Elgin Marbles, were to him the last word in artistic expression; and, as we have seen, when he went to Italy he followed virtually in the footsteps of Winkelmann. He had no eyes for anything but the antique; and Renaissance art only appealed to him in so far as it strove after classic imitation and classic excellence, a point of view which necessarily, and in spite of much genuine admiration, led him to a quite false view of artists like Michel Angelo and Leonardo da Vinci. Only in the case of Raphael does he seem disposed to make an exception. Raphael is not a "classic," but he stands on the heights of genius, and before such genius, before such a "re-born Greek," criticism must be dumb. Such being Goethe's standpoint, one need have little surprise that the beginnings of a new Romantic art in the early nineteenth century were abhorrent to him, and for the romantic "Nazarenertum" that sprang from the religious ecstasies of the first Romantic School, as for the literary expression of that attitude of mind, books like Wackenroder's Herzensergiessungen, he was never weary of expressing his dislike.

CHAPTER X

GOETHE'S PERSONALITY ; CONCLUSION

WHEN all has been said that can be said about Goethe's magnificent activity, we ultimately come back to the proposition with which we set out : Goethe's supreme work is himself. What Friedrich Schlegel said of Lessing might with more justice be said of Goethe : " He himself was of more worth than all his talents ; in his individuality lay his greatness." The key to his works is his personality ; he was the most " personal " of poets and the greatest personality among poets. His entire literary activity was in quite a unique degree the reflection of that personality. Again and again he explained—as if this were in the least necessary, or, indeed, anything but obvious—that his own writings were all subjective, even " occasional." The clearest confession on this matter is perhaps to be found in an often quoted passage from his autobiography : " If I desired for my poems a basis of truth, a feeling or reflection, I had to turn to my own heart ; if I required for my poetic representation an immediate intuition of an object or event, I could not go beyond the circle which was capable of appealing to me, of inspiring me with an interest. In this way I first wrote certain little poems in the form of songs, or in a freer measure ; they are founded on reflection, treat of the past and, for the most part, take an epigrammatic turn. And so began that tendency with which, all my life long, I was unable to break, namely, that of turning into an image, into a poem, whatever delighted or pained me, or otherwise occupied me, and of coming to a conclusion with myself about it, that I might both rectify my ideas of outward things and set my mind at rest about them. The faculty of being able to do this was, no doubt, to no one more necessary than it was to me, for my nature was always throwing me from one extreme to the other. Thus everything that I have put into writing is only a fragment of a great confession."

At the same time—as we have already seen in considering the works of Goethe's middle period—there is a very real danger of carrying the genetic method of interpretating Goethe's works too far ; in other words, seeking everywhere for the confession, discovering models for characters, actual experiences behind scenes and situations, even "explaining" on a subjective basis the most intangible lyric gems. The temptation to employ such a method does not merely arise from Goethe's own insistence on the personal element in his work, but in the fact that we are more richly provided in the case of Goethe than of any other poet with the materials for carrying out such a method. It might even be argued that Goethe's works are, after all, no more personal and subjective than those of other great poets who were not too burdened with literary conventions; only in their case we are freer to judge by purely impersonal canons, because the means of judging otherwise are denied to us.

We cannot attempt in this brief concluding chapter to sum up that magnificent personality which lies unfolded in Goethe's published writings. The most striking feature in it—the feature that stamps Goethe as the great exception—is its universality and balance; that quality which led Carlyle to see in Goethe the exemplar of the wise man. Goethe was sane and healthy, as few of the great men of our race are, whose strength lies in their imagination, whose mode of expression is art. He was a “Lebenskünstler” in the great style, and he succeeded, beyond his highest dreams, in rearing that pyramid of his life which in early life he had so nobly planned. An earlier generation was much troubled about what they called Goethe's ruthless egotism; he was described as the “apostle of self-culture,” behind which lay a reproach similar to that which was implied in the phrase “the great Heathen,” which our Victorian moralists used to apply to him. But one hears little nowadays of Goethe's "heathenism," and in our modern age the abnegation of self-culture, of the fullest development of all our faculties, would be regarded in a different light.

The balance and sanity of Goethe's nature is to be seen in the conduct of his own life. It was a peculiarly difficult life to conduct, for Goethe was endowed in a superlative degree with the artist's sensitiveness to impressions; he had a temperament peculiarly exposed to great enthusiasms; it was the kind of life which—as we see in only too many of the German poets and artists—without a firm, guiding character would have gone off at a tangent, have been unbalanced by dissipation. And, on the whole, it was a happy life. We say this not unmindful of that confession which Goethe made to Eckermann a few years before his death: "I have always been praised as one who was especially favoured by fortune; nor will I complain. . . . But at bottom it has been nothing but toil and trouble, and I think I may say that in all my seventy-five years I have never known four weeks of real well-being." That Goethe suffered keenly, that he learned bitter lessons in "nights spent in tears," is true, as it is true of all who are keenly sensitive to the world around them; but that he passed through a period of romantic renunciation, as Novalis, and after him, Carlyle, would have had us think, was not the case. There was no tinge of resigning pessimism in Goethe's nature; he was essentially buoyant, optimistic. He suffered, as he enjoyed, with great intensity; but he was always capable, so to speak, of detaching himself, of regarding his suffering as a mere onlooker at himself. Even in the most intense moments of despair he could see himself as an artist might look at a model in whom he had no personal interest. Never, even in his darkest moments, when he dallied with thoughts of suicide, did his own personality stand in danger of disintegration; he was himself no Werther.

Looking back once more on Goethe's extraordinarily varied literary output, we might ask: In what form of poetry did Goethe most excel? where is he to be found at his best and highest? Most critics will no doubt answer, in the lyric. In the epic he did not get beyond the idyll, or, if we will include his prose fiction under the heading epic, novels like Werther or Meister, which with all their peculiar excellences can hardly be claimed as masterpieces of the art of story-telling. As a dramatist he had great dramatic moments; but the element of artificiality which goes with all dramatic writing, the power of welding facts to the requirements of a rule-bound art, failed him. Moreover, he stood under another disadvantage—already referred to in these pages—the essentially untragic nature of his mind, which effectually prevented him writing an undiluted tragedy. His calm optimism did not allow him to cultivate that “sense for the cruel” which he appraised as the tragic quality in his friend Schiller’s genius. “Without an active, pathological interest I have never succeeded in working out any tragic situation, and I have therefore rather avoided than sought out such situations.” To say that Goethe was supreme as a lyric poet is only another way of saying that the peculiar strength of the German artistic genius lies in its power to give expression to the subjective; the lyric has in all ages been the highest form of German literary excellence. And Goethe’s lyric seems to sum up the qualities which we have learned to associate with the German lyric. It has the immediateness and direct truth of expression of the best popular lyric poetry—and the Germans have always regarded the folksong as an ideal to be striven for; and, as in the folksong, there is in Goethe’s poetry the thinnest possible veil between the emotion and its expression; that expression has the instinctive justness of word and tone, which in an unconscious way the best folksongs attain; it eliminates with no less sure an instinct all that is merely of the intellect, that does not fall within the legitimate sphere of lyric expression. But these are qualities that are true of all great German lyric poetry, and of any great lyric poetry ; and it is difficult to say wherein the peculiar differentiating qualities of Goethe's genius consist. The lyric, like the diamond, is most precious when it is freest from colour, from individual characteristics. In the fact that Goethe instinctively selected the right means to his end, lay his power. No singer excelled him in the power of crystallising fleeting emotions into thoughts and words and music. Other German poets have been able to interpret the spiritual in terms of the plastic, but their plastic has rarely been plastic enough, or occasionally, as in the case of Heine, it has gone to the opposite extreme of excessive plasticity ; Goethe always knew how to maintain the golden mean. To say, again, that Goethe's lyric is essentially a lyric of nature is no differentiating characteristic ; for that feature is common to all the German lyric poets from Klopstock onwards. But whereas Eichendorff attuned his emotions to the voices of the forest, Heine his to the music of the sea, and Lenau's pessimistic soul found itself reflected in the Hungarian pusta, Nature with all her manifold voices echoes through Goethe's lyric poetry. There is a bigness and a universality about his lyric genius before which that of these other poets seems small and personal.

A tribute to Goethe's many-sided personality is the metamorphosis which the estimate of it has undergone in succeeding generations in Germany, France and England. One might put side by side the wrapt and adoring attitude of the early Romanticists—who had as unclear an idea of Goethe as they had of Raphael—with the open dislike of “Young Germany”; or the pessimistically coloured portraits of him in the Germany of the sixties with the optimistic portraits of the nineties. The Goethe of France, again, has never been the Goethe of Germany; and France, too, saw him in her different periods at different angles. And in England we have had the widest deviations from the essentially Romantic, “renunciatory” Goethe of Carlyle, to the “apostle of culture” of Matthew Arnold.

The Victorian portrait of Goethe was in the main a moralist's one; he interested us less then as a poet than as a teacher. But we can hardly revert nowadays to that old standpoint; we have come to realise that it is no business of the supreme artist to teach. At the same time it may be said in defence of that opinion that Goethe was more than the supreme artist; much of his activity lay in fields where teaching is the main object. Our change of attitude lies rather in the fact that the lessons the generation of sixty years ago drew from his works are no longer vital lessons to us, who, in our practical life, have to face other intellectual problems than they. Goethe was a leader to a generation which stood, like himself, on the brink of a new era ; and that generation naturally sought guidance from him as to what attitude they should take to the new problems. But the world has not developed as Goethe believed it would develop ; society has refused to march forward by such undeviating ways, and on such clearly marked-out lines to a golden age of contented socialism, as were foreshadowed in the Wanderjahre. Man, on the contrary, finds it as hard to-day to be happy and contented with his lot as in the old unregenerate days. Science and philosophy have ceased to walk amiably hand in hand, as they did in the first thirty years of the nineteenth century. We have passed through collectivism and optimism to pessimism and individualism ; and we have swung back again to optimism. Literature has been romantic and realistic by turns ; above all, instead of that growing community of ideas, that realisation of the "world literature" to which Goethe looked so confidently forward, we have progressed on diametrically opposite lines. A new individualism has taken possession of the nations, the Romantic individualism which Goethe but dimly grasped has become the all-pervading and all-powerful idea of the last hundred years. The individual life and poetry of the little nations of Europe have developed in direct defiance of the cosmopolitan principles of "world literature"; barriers of nationality, in taste, in art, in literature, in ideas, have been set up, which neither steam nor electricity has been able to break down. Goethe could obviously have had no presentiment of this development, so different is it from that cosmopolitan community of thought which dominated the Europe in which he lived.

These things militate against Goethe's present-day influence; but to the individual man he still appeals with his pristine force; for the problem of the individual life is, more or less, the same in all ages. Whatever we may say to the futility, or even shallowness, of Goethe's metaphysics; however vague and elusive his religious thought may be; however transient and unjustified by later developments his social and political theories, we have still to say that no thinker of modern times has spoken so wisely and with such finality on the conduct of the personal life as Goethe. And our own Carlyle, with his strong moralising bias, recognised this as no other of Goethe's contemporaries, even in Germany. Goethe's writings are thus still, at the beginning of the twentieth century, a valuable guide to the practical wisdom of the individual life.

But, in saying so, we must recognise frankly that

Goethe's articles of faith rest on positive, optimistic presuppositions, which are no longer universally accepted; the golden rule of human conduct, as enunciated in the poetic allegory of Faust, is the last and highest development of optimistic thinking in Europe, which began with Leibniz and ripened in the confident common sense of the "Aufklärung." This is the historical position of Goethe's thinking, and in its definite historical position lies its limitations. No dogmas are for all time, and even before Goethe's career had run to its end, a new thinker had arisen in Europe who voiced an entirely different faith, built up on a supposition in direct antagonism to Goethe's practical ethics. The nineteenth century rose up on a foundation, not of rationalistic optimism, but of romantic pessimism; and on this new basis it had to formulate its ethic principles anew. "Entsagung" became, not what it was to Goethe, merely a pattern of a darker hue in the fabric of life, but synonymous with "Entbehren," the one reality, the bedrock of our whole morality. With this change of attitude new problems of the individual and social life arose, which Goethe's optimistic humanism and socialism could not solve. But the pessimistic phase of Schopenhauer—of Grillparzer and Lenau, of Leopardi and Wagner—had in turn to pass; and the pendulum has swung back again to a healthier outlook on life, which, although little in harmony with Goethe's social ideals, at least recognises and welcomes his magnificent individualism and his healthy maxims for the guidance of the individual life. No doubt this again will pass, for nowhere is finality ; but it at least means for us a vital tie between Goethe, the ripest product of the European "Aufklärung," and our own time. Goethe has still the power, in Carlyle's phrase, to "free us from Unbelief," to lead us back to a faith in ourselves, to help us to grapple with doubt and despair, to teach us :

Uns vom Halben zu entwöhnen,
Und im Ganzen, Guten, Schönen,
Resolut zu leben.

INDEX

- Altruism, Goethe's, 116 f.
 Anacreontic poetry, 6 f.
 Arnim, Bettina von, 78
 Arnold, Matthew, 117, 148
- Basedow, J. B., 19, 34
 Brentano, Maximiliane, 17 f.
 Brion, Friederike, 11, 30, 47
 Buff, Charlotte, 15 ff., 30
Bürgergeneral, Der, 119
 Byron, Lord, 77, 86
- Carlyle, Thomas, 56, 86, 114, 143,
 145, 148, 152
 Classicism, Goethe's, 40 f., 69,
 86, 136
Clavigo, 14, 19 f., 44, 68, 91 f.
- Dante, 37
 Darwin, Charles, 35, 132 ff.
 De Quincey, Thomas, 57
Dichtung und Wahrheit, 1, 4 f.,
 11, 16, 28, 77 f., 89
 Diderot, Denis, 10, 20
 Dilettantism in Weimar, 27 ff.
- Eckermann, J. P., 74, 98, 106,
 144
Egmont, 28, 32, 43 ff., 54, 56, 68
 Eichendorff, J. von, 147
Epilog zu Schillers Glocke, 121
- Epimenides Erwachen, Des*, 121
 Euripides, 49
- Fatalism, Goethe's, 115
Faust, 7, 22, 28 f., 43, 53 f., 66
 71, 74, 81, 88 ff., 112, 114,
 116, 123, 135, 151
 Fichte, J. G., 131
 Folksong, 9, 146
 Frederick the Great, 33
 French Revolution, The, 3, 51,
 117 ff.; of 1830, 87
- Geological Studies, Goethe's, 66
f., 135
 Gerstenberg, H. W. von, 136
Geschwister, Die, 32
 Goethe, J. W. von, his youth, 1
ff.; in Frankfurt, 3 ff., 6 f., 11 f.; in Leipzig, 3, 5 ff.; in Weimar, 15 f., 27 ff.; in Italy,
 24, 39 ff.; as Minister of State,
 33 ff., 117 f.; his friendship with Schiller, 63 ff.; old age, 76 ff.; death, 85; his personality, 141 ff.; as a lyric poet, 145 ff.; as a philosopher, 35, 108 ff., 150 ff.; as a scientist, 35, 43, 65 ff., 128 ff.
- Gothic architecture, 9, 139
Götz von Berlichingen, 11 ff.,
 17 ff., 44, 46, 71, 89 f.

154 GOETHE & THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

Greek literature and art, 138 f.
Grillparzer, F., 54, 151

Haeckel, E., 133

Hafiz, 81

Hebbel, C. F., 52, 54

Hegel, G. F. W., 86, 109 f.

Heine, H., 138, 147

Heinse, J. J., 42

Hellenism, Goethe's, 138 f.

Herder, J. F., 8, 30, 85, 130, 133, 136

Hermann und Dorothea, 65 ff., 119

Homer, 9 f., 15, 67, 138

Ibsen, Henrik, 52

Iphigenie auf Tauris, 28, 32, 37,
43, 45 ff., 54, 69

Italianische Reise, 38 ff., 80

Jacobi, F. H., 19, 123

Kant, Immanuel, 86, 109 f., 114

Karl August, Duke of Weimar,
24, 33, 55, 117 f.

Kestner, J. C., 15

Kleist, H. von, 54, 137

Klettenberg, Susanna von, 7

Kunst und Altertum, Über, 139

Laroche, Sophie von, 17

Laune des Verliebten, Die, 6

Lavater, J. K., 19

Leibniz, G. W., 86, 111, 133

Lemercier, S., 10

Lenau, N., 147, 151

Leopardi, G., 151

Lessing, G. E., 12, 20, 39, 85,
141

Linné, K. von, 131

Literary criticism, Goethe's, 14,
136 ff.

Lyric poetry, Goethe's, 6, 31,
145 ff.

Manzoni, A., 77

Merck, J. H., 14

Metamorphose der Pflanzen, Die,
131

Michel Angelo, 40, 139

Middle Ages, Goethe's attitude to
the, 137

Mitschuldigen, Die, 6

Napoleon, 117 ff., 126

Natürliche Tochter, Die, 66, 71,
119

Newton, Sir Isaac, 35, 136

Nibelungenlied, the, 137

Nietzsche, F., 115

Novalis, 145

Oeser, A., 10

Optics, Writings on, 135 f.

Optimism, Goethe's, 54, 107, 115,
126, 146

Ossian, 9 f., 138

Pandora, 71

Pantheism, Goethe's, 133 f.

Percy Ballads, The, 9

Pestalozzi, J. H., 34

Prometheus, 22, 28

Propyläen, Die, 139

Raphael, 40, 139 f., 148

Reineke Fuchs, 66

Religion, Goethe's, 122 ff.

Renunciation, 25, 113 f., 145,
151

Romanticism, 3, 70, 75, 82, 86 f., 110, 137, 148

- Römische Elegien*, 66
 Rousseau, J. J., 7 f., 13 f., 34,
 79, 85 f., 122, 130
- Schelling, F. W. J. von, 131
 Schiller, J. F. von, 12, 24, 36,
 42, 49, 54, 63 ff., 84, 86, 110,
 129
 Schönnemann, Lili, 23 f., 27,
 29 ff., 47, 68
 Schönkopf, Käthchen, 6, 11, 30
 Schopenhauer, A., 86, 136, 151
 Scott, Sir Walter, 57, 77, 86
 Shakespeare, W., 9 f., 12, 20,
 58, 137 f.
 Socialism, Goethe's, 122 f.
 Sophocles, 138
 Spinoza, B. de, 19, 109 f., 122
Sprüche in Prosa, 81
 Stein, Charlotte von, 30 f., 39,
 42, 47 f., 69
 Steinbach, Erwin von, 10
Stella, 20 f.
 Stolberg, C. and F. L. zu, 23
 Sturm und Drang, 4, 9 ff., 32,
 40 ff., 47, 70, 85, 90, 92, 113,
 136
- Thorane, Count, 4
Torquato Tasso, 21, 29, 32, 43,
 50 ff., 66, 69, 82
- Unterhaltungen deutscher Emi-granten*, 60
- Venezianische Epigramme*, 66
 Vico, G. B., 130
 Voltaire, F. A. de, 10, 33, 85, 137
 Vulpius, Christiane, 42 f., 66
- Waackenroder, W. H., 140
 Wagner, R., 151
Wahlverwandtschaften, Die, 72
 ff., 82
Werther, Leiden des jungen, 7 f.,
 16 ff., 28, 44, 46, 54 f., 58, 68,
 71, 138, 145
Westöstliche Divan, Der, 80 ff.
Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre, 22,
 32, 43, 56 ff., 64, 66, 73 f.,
 114, 145; Wanderjahre, 80 ff.,
 114, 121 ff., 149
 Winkelmann, J. J., 39, 139
 Wolff, C. von, 86
 World Literature, 77, 149 f.
 Willemer, Marianne von, 81
- Xenien*, 65
- Young Germany, 56, 148
- Zahme Xenien*, 81

PRINTED BY
TURNBULL AND SPEARS,
EDINBURGH

THE CAMBRIDGE MANUALS OF SCIENCE AND LITERATURE

Published by the Cambridge University Press

GENERAL EDITORS

P. GILES, Litt.D.

Master of Emmanuel College

and

A. C. SEWARD, M.A., F.R.S.

Professor of Botany in the University of Cambridge

VOLUMES NOW READY

- The Coming of Evolution. By Prof. J. W. Judd, C.B., F.R.S.
Heredity in the Light of Recent Research. By L. Doncaster, M.A.
The English Puritans. By the Rev. John Brown, D.D.
The Idea of God in Early Religions. By Dr F. B. Jevons.
Plant-Animals: a Study in Symbiosis. By Prof. F. W. Keeble, Sc.D.
Cash and Credit. By D. A. Barker, I.C.S.
The Natural History of Coal. By Dr E. A. Newell Arber.
The Early Religious Poetry of the Hebrews. By the Rev. E. G. King, D.D.
The History of the English Bible. By the Rev. John Brown, D.D.
Plant-Life on Land. By Prof. F. O. Bower, Sc.D., F.R.S.
An Historical Account of the Rise and Development of Presbyterianism in Scotland. By the Rt Hon. the Lord Balfour of Burleigh, K.T., G.C.M.G.
English Dialects from the Eighth Century to the Present Day. By the Rev. Prof. W. W. Skeat, Litt.D., D.C.L., F.B.A.
The Administration of Justice in Criminal Matters (in England and Wales). By G. Glover Alexander, M.A., LL.M.

VOLUMES NOW READY (continued)

- An Introduction to Experimental Psychology. By Dr C. S. Myers.
- The Ground Plan of the English Parish Church. By A. Hamilton Thompson, M.A., F.S.A.
- The Historical Growth of the English Parish Church. By A. Hamilton Thompson, M.A., F.S.A.
- Aerial Locomotion. By E. H. Harper, M.A., and Allan E. Ferguson, B.Sc.
- Electricity in Locomotion. By A. G. Whyte, B.Sc.
- New Zealand. By the Hon. Sir Robert Stout, K.C.M.G., LL.D., and J. Logan Stout, LL.B. (N.Z.).
- King Arthur in History and Legend. By Prof. W. Lewis Jones, M.A.
- The Early Religious Poetry of Persia. By the Rev. Prof. J. Hope Moulton, D.D., D.Theol. (Berlin).
- Greek Tragedy. By J. T. Sheppard, M.A.
- The Wanderings of Peoples. By Dr A. C. Haddon, F.R.S.
- Links with the Past in the Plant-World. By Prof. A. C. Seward, F.R.S.
- Primitive Animals. By Geoffrey Smith, M.A.
- Life in the Sea. By James Johnstone, B.Sc.
- The Moral Life and Moral Worth. By Prof. Sorley, Litt.D., F.B.A.
- The Migration of Birds. By T. A. Coward.
- Earthworms and their Allies. By F. E. Beddard, M.A., F.R.S.
- Prehistoric Man. By Dr W. L. H. Duckworth.
- The Modern Locomotive. By C. Edgar Allen, A.M.I.Mech.E.
- The Natural History of Clay. By Alfred B. Searle.
- The Origin of Earthquakes. By Dr C. Davison.
- The Ballad in Literature. By T. F. Henderson.
- Ancient Assyria. By Rev. C. H. W. Johns, Litt.D.
- The Work of Rain and Rivers. By the Rev. Prof. T. G. Bonney, LL.D., Sc.D., F.R.S.
- Rocks and their Origins. By Prof. Grenville A. J. Cole.
- A History of Civilization in Palestine. By Prof. R. A. S. Macalister, M.A., F.S.A.
- Goethe and the Twentieth Century. By Prof. J. G. Robertson, M.A., Ph.D.
- Spiders. By C. Warburton, M.A.
- Methodism. By Rev. H. B. Workman, D.Lit.
- Life in the Medieval University. By R. S. Rait, M.A.
- The Troubadours. By the Rev. H. J. Chaytor, M.A.
- Individuality in the Animal Kingdom. By Julian Huxley, B.A.

VOLUMES IN PREPARATION

- The Civilization of Ancient Mexico. By Lewis Spence.
China and the Manchus. By Prof. H. A. Giles.
Clouds. By C. T. R. Wilson, F.R.S.
The Measurement of Time. By the Astronomer Royal.
St Paul and Christianity. By the Rev. Principal Headlam, D.D.
The Development of Coinage. By George Macdonald, LL.D.
Glaciers and Ice Sheets. By Prof. Garwood, M.A., Sec.G.S.
The Psychology of Insanity. By Dr Bernard Hart.
The New Field Botany. By Dr C. E. Moss.
Flies. By Dr Gordon Hewitt.
The Green Leaf. By Dr F. F. Blackman, F.R.S.
The Phoenicians. By Prof. J. L. Myres, F.S.A.
The Physical Basis of Music. By A. Wood, M.A.
The Meteorology of the Globe. By Dr W. N. Shaw, F.R.S.
Brewing. By A. Chaston Chapman, F.I.C.
The Talmud. By I. Abrahams, M.A.
Growth and Form. By Prof. D'Arcy W. Thompson, C.B., M.A.
Beyond the Atom. By Prof. J. Cox.
Ancient India. By Prof. E. J. Rapson, M.A.
The Icelandic Sagas. By W. A. Craigie, LL.D.
Mysticism in Modern English Literature. By Miss C. F. E. Spurgeon.
The Early Religious Poetry of India. By A. A. Macdonell.
German School Education. By K. H. Breul, Litt.D.
The Moral and Political Ideas of Plato. By A. M. Adam, M.A.
The Growth of Municipalities. By H. D. Hazeltine, M.A.
Ancient Babylonia. By Rev. C. H. W. Johns, Litt.D.
Early Christian Poetry. By Prof. F. C. Burkitt, M.A., F.B.A.
Discovery in Greek Lands. By F. H. Marshall, M.A.
The Crusades. By Rev. Prof. J. P. Whitney, B.D.
Monumental Brasses. By J. S. M. Ward, B.A., F.R.Hist.S.
The Earth. By Prof. Poynting, F.R.S.
Metals. By F. E. E. Lamplough, M.A.
The Book. By H. G. Aldis, M.A.
Wireless Telegraphy. By C. L. Fortescue.
Women's Work. By Miss Constance Smith.
The Modern Warship. By E. L. Attwood.
The Vikings. By Prof. A. Mawer.
Eugenics. By Prof. R. C. Punnett, M.A.

VOLUMES IN PREPARATION (continued)

Insects as Carriers of Disease. By Prof. G. H. F. Nuttall, F.R.S.
Natural Caves and Fissures. By Dr A. Rule.
Submerged Forests By Clement Reid, F.R.S.
A Grammar of Heraldry. By W. H. St John Hope, M.A.
Prehistoric Britain. By L. McL. Mann.
The Story of a Loaf of Bread. By Prof. T. B. Wood.
Soil Fertility. By Dr E. J. Russell.
Comparative Religion. By. Prof. F. B. Jevons, Litt.D.

PRESS NOTICES

"For those who have neither the time nor the preliminary training to study great subjects on a grand scale these excellent handbooks seem specially designed. They have been written by scholars of eminence, and give in small compass an admirable epitome of the subjects with which they deal.....These little volumes represent the essence that the specialism of to-day can give to the people in popular form on the subjects dealt with."

Scotsman

"The Cambridge Manuals of Science and Literature have already conquered a wide audience amongst cultured people. They are short studies of great subjects, and are published by the University Press at one shilling.....The Cambridge Press is casting its literary net widely."—Standard

"No such masterpieces of concentrated excellence as these Cambridge Manuals have been published since the Literature and Science Primers of about thirty years ago, in which the leading men of that day made complete expositions in miniature of their respective subjects..... The increase of specialisation which is steadily going on enormously enhances the value of manuals such as these, in which an expert who has every detail of a particular subject at his finger ends makes a pithy and luminous summary of it for the enlightenment of the general reader, and enables him to grasp easily the fruit of the work of many minds."

Nottingham Guardian

Cambridge University Press

London : Fetter Lane, E.C.

C. F. Clay, Manager

Edinburgh : 100, Princes Street

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY
Los Angeles
This book is DUE on the last date stamped below.

REC'D LD-URE
AUG 18 1980

24139

UNIVERSITY of CALIFORNIA
AT
LOS ANGELES
LIBRARY

3 1158 00613 0099

Pp
(G)

123

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA 000 531 951 2

